The Noisy Fourth

This is the day we celebrate; proud should we be of the day but far from proud of our method of expressing our jubilance. Our Fourth of July demonstrativeness is in harmony with the style of oratory prevalent about this time of year. Neither is worthy of the sentiment that inspires the guilty parties. The sound and fury that are characteristic of both are more suggestive of the chauvinistic spirit than of true patriotism. It is not pleasant to reflect that "the day we celebrate" has become a day of dread to many thousands of people, who flee from town to safeguard their nerves. Those fugitives are no less patriotic than their strenuous fellow-citizens who can find no better way of expressing emotion than by exploding detonating bombs and other ill-smelling specimens of Chinese handicraft and ingenuity. It is a humiliating commentary on our advanced civilization that the exuberance of our national spirits is annually expressed in a barbarous custom borrowed from the most effete heathens of the Orient. But it is not the humiliating circumstance of a borrowed, barbarous custom that should give us pause. We have made such substantial progress as a nation that we need not worry over our propensity to indulge animal spirits in a way that bespeaks a survival of the savage in our nature. It is not the absurdity of the custom so much as the offensiveness of it that should concern us. It is offensive not only because it jars the nerves and depopulates large centres of activity, dampening the patriotic ardor of the high-strung native, but for the more important reason that it jeopardizes life and property. The custom of celebrating the Fourth with fireworks has cost us more than our wars. There is more blood shed every Fourth than was spilled in the battles of the Yanko-Spanko disturbance. Why not be content to make the Fourth glorious by the flow of wit, eloquence and champagne? When spread-eagle orators are turned loose simultaneously in every town and hamlet in the land, the explosion should be sufficiently vociferous to satisfy all true lovers of noise.

New Definition of a Gentleman

The other day during the trial of a case in Santa Rosa a witness referred to some one as "a gentleman." Asked for the reason for this title the witness promptly responded: "He keeps an automobile." In this wise the discovery comes to hand that we are proudly moving up with the machines. Thomas Carlyle, in defining a gentleman, used to say he was a man who kept a gig. The veriest "pudd'nhead" can realize the immense stride civilization has made when the possession of an automobile is recognized as the mark of a gentleman. Most any man in these piping days of trusts can live up to and act up to the smartest kind of a gig, but how many can show the polish, the savoir faire, the—the "get there" and the bank roll sufficient to entitle them to get inside the corral and be deservedly branded under the new definition of the word, gentleman? Nay, the restriction goes further. Noblesse oblige: these men of gentle rank in the possession of their magnificent chou-chou machines are called upon to run them under the restrictions of gentlemanly conduct. It cannot on any theory of etiquette be considered gentlemanly to bump into an old lady plodding along the highway and then to duck around the corner without handing her a card. Thus is the behavior of the gentleman cut out for him as he grandly ascends in a civilization that is mounting "on wheels" to higher things.

Belasco's Fiasco in Berlin

Belasco's press agent is just now having a sizzling time in Berlin. "Du Barry" was produced there recently, and the German critics poked such fun at the play and bombarded the acts with such acidulous shot that they reduced the house to "empty seats." At once the resourceful press agent determined to get some sort of advertisement out of the fiasco even if he had to twist the incident into a charge that the hissing of the German critics was intended as a national slap at American art. He had heralded the play as the first genuine American dramatic product representing the higher standard of dramatic development in young America. Belasco was touted as America's Sardou. After all this kind of buncombe he expected the Germans to sing the praises of the play and playwright and to prove their sincerity by rolling their thalers into the box-office. This is the day of the international glad-hand, and, of course, the Germans ought to keep their end up by welcoming the "Du Barry" invasion of the Fatherland. After all this prelude the surprised press agent awoke one morning to read in the public prints that the critics agreed that dramatic art in the United States must still be in swaddling clothes if the frou-frous exhibited by "Du Barry" were a sample. They laughed, sneered and jeered at the play and empty benches followed. The press agent forthwith leaped on high and shrieked "Assassin critics, you have dealt the death blow to the American drama on the German stage." Naturally the partisans gathered, ink began to flow, and the war is now on. It so happened that just before Belasco put on his play at this same Berlin theater the boards were graced by the talented Californian, Miss Ysidora Duncan. She won great success through her artistic interpretation of various dances. Now the active press agent is asserting that as the Berlin critics recognized Miss Duncan's art they must perforce admit that other art may come out of America "not dressed in swaddling clothes," and why may it not be in the Belasco package entitled "Du Barry?" This prize package argument did not alter the opinion of the critics, so the P. A. declared they were "no good anyway" because some of them had even guyed Miss Duncan, who "had succeeded in elevating to ideality and the esthetic the most sensual of all forms of art, dancing." In his last screed he wound up as follows:

"Miss Ysidora Duncan, who achieved her triumphs on the stage of the Theatre des Westens, is a Californian by birth. Graceful and willowy in action, Miss Duncan succeeded in exhibiting her new terpsichorean art, her dance interpretation of Chopin and other masters of musical composition, with such refinement and grace that she was proclaimed the creator of a new art. The same Berlin critics who denounce Belasco's 'Du Barry' went into ecstacy over Miss Duncan's art. For three hours Miss Duncan danced before them and was able to hold and sustain their interest and admiration. But to-day there is hardly a low-class music hall or burlesque theater in Berlin which is not producing 'Duncan-can' dances, and there is no comic paper which has not poked its rather vulgar cartoons at Miss Duncan. An American teaching us anything ideal, or revealing to us a new art! Banish the thought! That was finally the sum and substance of Berlin's opinion of Duncanism."

Just the same, Miss Duncan seems to be meeting with her old-time success in the high places where she gives her exhibitions of dancing. Isn't there an old proverb among the stage "props" which reads that "Imitation is the sincerest flattery?" As for "imitations" on the stage and burlesques, it's pretty well known the "dubs" and the "fizzles" are never accorded that recognition. Has the blasting of Belasco's play by the Berlin critics caused any of the burlesque houses to produce a skit on "Du Barry?" Perhaps German good taste does not relish "Du Barry" as dished up by Belasco. This indignant press agent will only succeed in doing one thing—drowning the Berlin fiasco of Belasco in printer's ink.

Jekyll and Hyde Politicians

The political pot gives up the same results the world over. If there is any apparent difference it can be found in word juggling. The method and the result will be found identical. Recent results in Servia only corroborate this view. Public opinion called for an expression of abhorrence of assassination and certain pledges of reform from Prince Peter: they were promptly forthcoming. Underground politics required that he should at the same time assure the assassins that he would do nothing of the kind. Otherwise his election and tenure of the throne might be as insecure as those of his predecessor. He promised both sides and got the throne—the regular way of the politician, whether in Servia or America. For years he had been planning to regain the throne for the house of Karageorgevitch, of which he is the head, and the murder of the heads of the other house was the first chance that offered to obtain it in that cheapest of politician's bonds—his promise to do or not to do a certain thing, or both. King Peter is not the first politician who has won his job by promising to do different acts for opposing factions. Impartial observers will fail to find any material difference between his inconsistency and similar inconsistency on the part of well-known local office-holders. The dodge of promising everything demanded by public opinion while at the same time having a private understanding of an exactly opposite nature with the machine has been familiarly demonstrated time and again between here and Sacramento. The machine that upset the late throne boosted King Peter upon the wreck. He never could have got there without its assistance, and he never could have got that assistance without his double-faced pledges. The machine doubtless smiled grimly at his public utterance that he "deeply regretted that it had been thought necessary to shed streams of blood, and deplored the fact that the army had taken recourse to such measures," but the machine knew that these words were merely sops to the multitude and did not mean any more than his pledges of reform. The men behind an American machine have a similar smile on their faces when they hear their candidates make "reform" promises to the public. But this farce becomes a tragedy when the machine becomes so weak that it cannot restrain its tool, or when a rival machine rises up powerful enough to crush it—as happened in the case of the late King Alexander himself. It was only a few years ago that he splintered the one that made him.

Another Deluge Threatened

This is the age of cutting expenses and the Society of American Authors, after carefully scanning the field, has decided that it can best bulge the bank account of the craft by saving some of the postage on poetry and other literary output. It is going to urge Congress at the next session to permit authors' manuscripts to be carried in the mails at third-class rates instead of regular letter postage, as at present. This means a reduction from two cents for each ounce to one cent for two ounces. A Hawthorne, a Poe or a Lowell wouldn't save much annually on the proposed new scale but the jokesmith, the literary machine, and the short story manipulator are expected to make enough out of it to buy some of the cheaper breakfast foods. It's a rasping commentary on the Society that it sees an easier way to earn a penny in this fashion than by a higher cultivation of its fertile field of work. But, alas, has this pondering Society considered what this momentous change will mean to the trustful editor? Already those over-worked wights are chin deep in manuscripts. Every other man, woman and child seems to be contributing to this mighty flood of "copy" which is struggling against a weak two-cent postage levee, to sweep over the editorial rooms of the land and deluge the resplendent sanctum sanctorums out of sight. What avail hope and trust in the heart of the simple editor when men must write and women must write and the Society of American Authors hacks at the only bulwark of safety, the two-cent postage rate?

His Idea of "Professional Suicide"

The question of David Bispham's legal residence being in dispute during the trial of his divorce suit, in England, he said: "I am proud of the fact that I am an American, but I never intend to live in the United States because it is not a musical country, and it would be professional suicide for a singer to make his home there." If the commercial value of Mr. Bispham's voice, in his opinion, depends in the slightest measure on the particular spot in the world which he chooses for his legal residence, he must set a very low estimate on the voice and clothe it with an evanescent quality it does not deserve. We have yet to learn of another member of the old Grau Opera Company, or any other singer, or for that matter any painter, sculptor, architect, orator, poet or musician, who has committed "professional suicide" in that way—that is by making a home outside of a certain radius bounding the centre of his or her art. Real talent of any sort that elects to sell itself to the public belongs to the world, and the world takes it at a true value no matter where it chances to take board or lodging or to pay taxes. The records hold a long list of talented Americans, who, notwithstanding their residences in this country, won both fame and wealth the world over without committing "professional suicide." Is Mr. Bispham untactful or was his utterance made for advertising purposes in Europe?

Charging for College Education

Objection seems to be raised in some quarters against the announcement that a fee of two dollars will be demanded of students late in registering at the University of California this year. There is no good reason why fees should not be charged, and why students should not pay for all they get. Most of them would value their education more than they do if it cost them something and a system of fees would weed out a considerable number of attendants who simply keep on at school because they do not know what else to do with themselves, and neither reflect credit on the University nor render the State any equivalent for the bounty they take advantage of. The glorious boast of unlimited free education for all applicants is getting to be very much like the proverbial whistling to keep up courage while walking through a dark graveyard. We have become so used to hearing education praised as a great and wonderful thing, without reference to the use that is made of it, that we do not dare to stop and examine it. Merely going to college, in search of that elusive chimera, "general culture," is about as profitable a task as filling both hands with sand and then attempting to perform manual labor. A college education, unless undertaken for some specific purpose, is a waste of time and life. To spend four or five years conning over the thoughts and opinions of other people when one might be doing one's own thinking, is a futility to be expected from our brilliant educational system. It is suggested that every one is not capable of originating thought, to which one may make answer, then why send the idiots to college? Nine-tenths of the general students in college today gain nothing better from their four years of study than discontent and dissatisfaction with their homes and relatives. They imbibe an idea that they are superior, and that somehow, somewhere, a great wrong has been done to them in that they were not born "higher up." It is not the "divine discontent" that leads to betterment, but a peevish, whining, ill-temper. There is more need for good handicraftsmen and artisans today than for half-baked doctors and lawyers, and with the proportion of two teachers to every class in California, there is no great demand for more girls to fit themselves for pedagogy, especially as the high and normal schools deliver a yearly grist of nearly five hundred. The fact of having continued to attend school of some kind up to the twenty-fifth year or later is not in itself any more useful or creditable than that of having gone to bed every night at nine o'clock. Instead of offering inducements to every yokel, reducing the requirements to the lowest notch, and dispensing with fees, it would be more to the purpose if admission to college were less easy. The pathetic story of the poor youth sounds better in print than in life. Given the twenty-six letters of the alphabet, and determination and a desire to learn will do the rest, and do it just as effectively and without either levying tribute on the public or acquiring expensive habits at the same time. It is noteworthy that while colleges multiply and attendance at each one of them increases, scholarship does not, and except those who take special courses with a definite aim in view, little, if anything is heard of the others. The college men who write would, in most instances, write just as well if they had stopped short with the high school, and those who enter other callings speedily forget all they learned, or thought they did, in order to make room for the special knowledge they need.

On the Cultivation of Vice

Readers of the "Last Essays of Elia" will remember the dinner that the New Year, upon his coming of age, gave to the Days; and how unconditionally they, if right minded and not over-righteous, sympathized with the jovial Christmas Day in a certain design he had upon the too decorous Ash Wednesday; and will own up to it that they also had "a mighty desire to see how the old Domine would behave himself in his cups."

Most of us, being honest sinners, enjoy a mischievous delight, not altogether unworthy of our human estate, in detecting the slips of those who go through life walking with provoking pretentiousness a chalk-line drawn precisely along the middle of the straight and narrow path. We may detest drunkenness, and yet long to catch the President of the International Prohibition League napping and nipping.

Why is the aforesaid "Elia," or Lamb, one of the most lovable of writers? Is it not because of his endearing weaknesses? What prevented Stevenson, our own latter-day Lamb, from being quite just to Thoreau? The fact that he who dwelt apart from men by Walden Pond "was almost shockingly devoid of weaknesses; he had not enough of them to make him truly polar with humanity." I trust, dear reader, that neither your biographer nor mine may find any lack of polarity on our part a stumbling-block and an offense, and an occasion for adverse criticism! But let us be of good cheer: the sinless are no kith or kin of ours.

A man should cultivate a vice or two, were it only for the sake of sociability. The too good are no good at all in this imperfect, sinning sphere. They deserve to die. Their presence here among men is a perpetual intrusion. Had they but a few sins to their credit, they might be tolerable company; but this over-righteousness of theirs is in the worst possible taste, downright rudeness, an insult almost to common humanity. Is it not, to say the least, the height of ill-breeding to make honest mortals so uncomfortable in your presence that they feel they must needs give themselves up forthwith to the police? I propose that for the protection of everyday humanity, and for the furtherance of good fellowship, there be organized a Society for the Suppression of Too-Much Virtue. Persons without a single failing are a menace to mankind. These incredible creatures are much too bright and good for human nature's —Sunday dinner, even. To common nostrils the odor of sanctity that hangs about them is overpowering.

Angels in heaven we adore; and their visits, brief and far between, give rise to endless anticipations, afford pretty figures for their peers the poets, and may be used to point pleasant morals and adorn delightful tales. They don't go flaunting their feathers in the faces of the earth-born, or sit preening them aloof; but come in the likeness of men, and try a fall with you, or what not. But these wearers of borrowed plumes that I am having at—in our hearts we know them for pretenders; for moral negations, and no angels. Just as apes offend us, being as it were imitations of men, made by some amateur deity, so do these non-human offend, being as it were imitations of angels, made by—themselves!

Before going farther, it may be well to forestall possible misconceptions. I am not the devil's advocate, making out a case in favor of vice (to tell the truth, I would far liefer be God's advocate, defending virtue); but I do mean to say that it takes at least one failing to make a man companionable in this our spotted but beautiful existence, and that nothing short of divinity can be both sinless and lovable. Holiness is a high word. I hope I do it at all times reverence; but having on more than one occasion ventured to lift my eyes to the faces of your self-made angels, I came at length to see that the beauty of holiness was not theirs; that their lives were very unlovely; and having a holy horror of ugliness, I was moved to cry out to my companions, "If this be virtue, for God's sake let us sin!"

Purity in man or woman I love no less than thou dost, or thou; and yet, the fiercely virginal female, in her impregnable prudery, defending with unnecessary vigilance and vigor a chastity that no man ever dreamed of assailing, in either hand a stone for an erring sister—her it would, I hold, be a kindness to lead into the paths of dalliance—for her soul's sake. Who—but no; that would be asking too much of poor masculine human nature. God made her to the end of holding in check the evil desires that rise so readily in the desperately wicked heart of man; and all unwittingly she more than fulfills the divine intention.

Truly, I am more than half serious in saying that the too righteous need for their salvation—for the extension of their sympathies—a redeeming fault or so. I think it is human to err every now and then. However, I think also (I am wholly serious now) that to forgive upon occasion is equally human.

The disinterested devotion of women, to remember which makes pessimism impossible; the heroic deeds which men are doing and have done; the works of artists everywhere and when; these, to my thinking, are every whit as human as are follies and foibles and the like. Heroism, the disinterested doing of noble things, is just as human as Nero-ism, the doing of cruel things, or zero-ism, the doing of nothing. If to hate is human, it is likewise human to love. Man is made for successes no less than for failures. The fire is as characteristic of him as the clay; the divinity as the dust. If we humans have mighty desires to see how old Dominies behave themselves in their cups, and resent too much righteousness, we have also mighty desires to see old sinners some to their senses, behave themselves after some sublime sort. Some of the touches of nature that make the whole world kin would be to the credit of archangels.

HARRY COWELL.

The Saunterer

Exhibits in the Eppinger Failure

The show of rounding up the Eppinger firm and forcing its members to make good the shortage of some two million dollars is rapidly vanishing into thin air—into hot thin air. Two forms of investigating the affair were had. One, public, by the Grand Jury; the other private, by committees of business men. The inquiry by the Grand Jury was the usual farce. Every taxpayer has been educated by this time into knowing full well how inquiries into such cases usually end with a Grand Jury. The only hope of those who stood for a higher moral tone in our business community lay in the business men's committees. But the results were foregone as soon as they were named. Charges of "fine work" filled the air. Men who stood closer to the members of the delinquent firm than a postage stamp to an envelope were given the task of digging into the acts of Eppinger & Co.

Kinds of Influence Used

There followed a notable illustration of what is known in business circles as fraternal, religious and "stand in" influence. The last named is a case of speculators "standing in" against outsiders. "All for one and one for all" is the password. The understanding is that if a crony is caught in the meshes of the law he ought to be helped out —that is if it costs only influence and a cash outlay that is fully warranted by the profits in sight. The new local bankruptcy law is a standing commentary on the "stand in" methods of the most notorious wing of this business community. Before that law was adopted gentlemen of their kidney used to "stand in" when a local man failed and unite to squeeze the Eastern creditors. Under their flim-flam system insolvency became a good money-making business. Their methods finally became so flagrant that Eastern merchants hustled about and clapped the gyves upon such acts by having the present bankruptcy law adopted transferring the cases of insolvents from the Superior to the Federal courts.

Kicked Over Business Idols

The execution of all proceedings against the Eppingers was tacitly passed up to the involved banks. They were the heaviest losers and the highest representatives of the solid business element, and it was expected of them not only to safeguard but to advance the moral integrity of the community should it be threatened. Had they made the stand expected there would have been another story. "But capital is timid and notoriously sensitive." The condition of the case was put to them in such adroit fashion by those specially engaged to manage the matter that each institution thought it alone was going to enjoy the best dicker when it came to payment. Wells, Fargo & Co.'s bank was one that made some sign of exercising drastic proceedings. Several of its directors summarily kicked over the idols of fraternal and religious pull and—well, there has been something of a shake-up since in its management. Some of the other banks will undergo a like experience when they emerge from the hypnotized spell into which they have been thrown by the artful spell-binders.

Winked at Thimble-Rigging Methods

Already warm and bitter words are being heaped on officers who ought to have scrutinized the value of the securities more closely. Venturesome engineers on railroads are continually breaking rules and "taking chances" to make up time. Their delinquencies are winked at by the management as long as there is no smash-up. But when the smash-up comes the world comes down on the erring engineer and the railroad management hardest of all. So in the present instance. The bank managers who "took chances" against bank rules and, on the strength of holding warehouse receipts for grain, winked at the Eppingers' thimble-rigging in shipments and sales, won't be allowed to crawl behind the lame excuse that "it was customary."

The Artful Managers of the Show

The whole show has been most artfully managed and the "Commission" General will undoubtedly earn a big name in his line and come in for further business. Why not? They may raise Napoleons of finance in the East but California can cap them all with cash results when it comes to showing the coups of the Ferdinands of failure she breeds. The State is rising to the fate ordained when it allowed the lawyers to develop who acquired for it the reputation of being the greatest will breaker on earth. Not long ago an insurance company with headquarters in Japan was commercially damned by local merchants for practically repudiating some of its policies. The case showed how much depends on who does the thimble-rigging and how much the game is ahead before the explosion. Was General Butler right when he said a man was a fool for stealing less than one hundred thousand dollars, because with that sum he could easily buy immunity from prosecution with fifty thousand and retain a handsome balance to reward his "business" acumen.

Miss Wilson's Double Run of Luck

Miss Emily Wilson has had to parry all sorts of thrusts from her friends because she received both the ring and the thimble at the Murphy-Hopkins wedding and kept the fact a secret until one of the guests accidentally discovered it. There was a merry search for the tell-tale trinkets always hidden in a wedding cake and it was finally decided that the unscrupulous caterer had neglected to put them there, and many were the anathemas called down on his head by the girls who still have a third finger "to let." All the time they were making this to-do over it Miss Wilson had the ring and thimble tucked away out of sight, having quickly removed them from the piece of cake she drew. When of the girls caught the glint of the pretty baubles and pounced on Miss Wilson she blushingly said "that it seemed so silly for her to have drawn both," and now society is wondering whether there is not a Cupid in the woodpile who was responsible for Miss Wilson's embarrassment over her lot.

Monks May Come to California

I learn that there is a strong possibility of the Carthusian monks, the makers of the famous Chartreuse, establishing themselves in California. Since their expulsion from the Grand Chartreuse in France the monks have had committees in almost every country of Europe seeking a suitable location for the establishment of their headquarters where their famous liqueur can be manufactured without government intervention. Not long ago it seemed to be definitely determined that they would settle on the Island of Iona, off the coast of Scotland. But when they learned that all ecclesiastical buildings on the island had been secured to the Established Church of Scotland forever purchase was out of the question. The monks who actually make the famous liqueur are temporarily at Tarragona, Spain. None of it is being made just now because there are great supplies on hand yet untouched. A committee of the monks left for the United States last week, with a view to discovering if California could furnish a location suitable for the purpose which they can own entirely and over which they will have undisputed sway.

Caught in a Fluttering Handkerchief

A well known merchant and club man went down to the Pacific Mail dock not long ago to see his wife and her sister and husband off to the islands. After the last fond good-byes and the clearing of the ship he walked along the dock to flutter his pocket handkerchief in response to those waving in the hands of his relatives on board ship. Several hundred other people pressed around him, most of them waving farewells to those on the departing liner. In turning to get a better view he brushed suddenly against a smartly gowned woman beside him. Apparently she too was waving a fond farewell to some one on board the vessel. The merchant apologized. When he caught the glamour of the warm blush that suddenly suffused the pretty face beside him, he took occasion to say that he was sorry the crowd was so great as to trouble her. "It's my own fault," she answered. "I ought to have known better and should not have been drawn into it. But I did so want to wave Dick just one last good-bye. I don't really know what I'm going to do. How shall I get out of this?" and she looked around her, quite perplexed.

Luncheon a Deux

Of course he volunteered to escort her through the jostling crowd and off the wharf. As travelers know that is a walk of several score of yards. When they reached the street he begged permission to see her on a car and she smilingly said he might ride up to Market street with her. At Market street he had recovered himself sufficiently to hazard that he was a bit sharp set after his sea trip and he suggested a bit of luncheon. Just a bite. She looked a bit frightened at the thought but after some pressing she consented. During that tantalizing luncheon he learned only two things—that she was deucedly pretty and that "Dick" wasn't her husband. He didn't even learn her name but he got a promise from her that she would dine with him the next evening.

Told in Song and Story

He knows more about her now. She is living in a handsome Laguna street flat and he is still ordering the things for their dinners—and breakfasts—and he does it mornings on his way down town. I wonder how many fond wives, who from the deck of an outgoing steamer bid their hubbies farewell, realize how many strange domestic complications may be in the surrounding air. The new flat was started some three weeks ago, it was the first of its kind in that family, and at present it gives every token of continuing in existence long after the return of the travelers from the islands. All of which goes to show that sirens lurk about the wharves for victims as well as about the waters of summer resorts.

An Indecent Exposure

Some people will not be denied at any cost when there is a little coin of the realm in sight. It appears that Edna Wallace Hopper undertook to break the will of Alexander Dunsmuir even at the risk of blasting the reputation of her dead mother, and incidentally of presenting herself to the world as the daughter of a woman with a somewhat pungent past. A posthumous family skeleton is never so repellant as when dangled in the light of day through sordid motives by those to whom decency should dictate that it be concealed. Edna Wallace Hopper has long posed as a rich woman, and though her pretensions as to wealth may have been greatly exaggerated she is at least in comfortable circumstances, and therefore she cannot plead penury in extenuation of her indecent expose of her mother's past. And though some actresses are willing to avail themselves of any pretext to promote publicity, as for instance Mabel Gilman who sought notoriety through the publication of a Mongolian potentate's love letters, I should be reluctant to believe that Edna Wallace Hopper thought only of the advertising in store when she instituted that will contest.

New Homes of the Haggins

The house at Versailles, near Lexington, where Mr. and Mrs. James B. Haggin will spend the summer, is the site of an old colonial house which has one of the most romantic histories of the famous homes of Kentucky. The old mansion has been moved back and stands in the rear of the new palace, which has four colonial columns at the front of the house and two imposing lions guarding the entrance. Most of the Haggin famous horses are in the handsome stables near by. The family will shortly erect a new winter home on Fifth avenue. Mrs. Richard Lounsbery, Mr. Haggin's daughter by his first wife, is abroad with her debutante daughter, Miss Edith, but will return in July. The present Mrs. Haggin was a relative of the first wife and was brought up in her husband's house.

There was a dance at a Santa Cruz mountain resort the other night. One of the young women present was asked for the honor of a two-step.

"Oh, I can't dance without my appendix," she said, pressing her side.

Appendicitis operations, it appears, interfere with terpsichorean pleasures.

Grant's Boomerang Boomlet

There is a vice-presidential boom on down south in San Diego, for U. S. Grant, who has long been engaged in trying to capitalize the name of his illustrious father for political purposes. The boom was started by J. Wade McDonald, who wrote a letter to the San Diego Union calling attention to Grant's peculiar fitness for the position. "There is only one man on the Pacific coast who is thoroughly available for the position," says McDonald, "and that is U. S. Grant Jr. of San Diego." He closed the letter with this ingenious bit of word-painting which has the true San Diego flavor: "The slogan—the Atlantic and Pacific, Roosevelt and Grant—would evolve a torrent of popular approval that would sweep the country from centre to circumference with the irresistible force of an Alpine avalanche and the fierce enthusiasm of a Kansas cyclone." Mr. J. Wade McDonald, be it known, is Mr. Grant's attorney, a circumstance that probably accounts for the cyclonic enthusiasm of his pen.

His Refreshing Modesty

They have a very artful way of doing things political down in San Diego. Mr. Grant followed up his attorney's letter with one of his own which contained the following naive statement: "I have not announced myself as a candidate for the Vice-Presidential nomination, but I have known that some of my friends have entertained the feeling that the position ought to come to this coast, and that I would probably be as available as any other citizen of the section." Mark the rare modesty of the man. Far be it from him to consider himself more available than any other citizen of the section. Content is he to regard himself merely as the peer of his fellow men. There is a comic opera flavor to the Grant boom which is positively refreshing. The attorney and his wealthy and ambitious client remind one of their famous prototypes, two of the three tailors of Tooley street, for what could be more preposterous than a Vice-Presidential boom started by an aspirant for the job and his attorney in little old San Diego by the sea. Mr. Grant blames the whole thing on his friends, but that has been the way of the job-chaser from time immemorial. He is the first to call attention to his own availability by circulating the report that certain friends are urging him to stand for the nomination. As a matter of fact Mr. Grant's friends want him to enter the race again for United States Senator, for they know that he will be sure to open his barrel again in the event of his aspiring for the toga. And by the way I should like to know whether Mr. Grant believes that he established his availability as a Vice-Presidential candidate when he sought to buy his way into the United States Senate a few years ago; also whether he thinks that the memory of that contest would aid him in his Vice-Presidential aspirations.

Astonished Her Critics

The superstition that California is principally inhabited by cowboys and miners is still frequent enough in certain New York circles to produce rather humorous effects. This belief has been partly kept alive by such literary Buffalo Bills as Charles F. Lummis and Joaquin Miller, who have come out of the West in corduroys and buckskins and made Fifth avenue sit up and take notice. Not satisfied with this, I am told, some of the most sedate and conventional of our citizens, when they get among the local-color seekers of Gotham, will cast aside the everyday business garb in which they were accustomed to appear while in San Francisco and blossom out in the hides and hair of semi-savagery. While visiting New York, it is said, Miss Evelyn McCormack, the painter, was joked about being a wild westerner and yet appearing clad like any other girl. She stood this for awhile but at last she got tired of it and resolved on a decisive move for the reputation of California. She was stopping at one of the best known hotels at the time, and she fairly caused a panic in the dining-room one morning by appearing in a garb of buckskin adorned with rattlesnake trimmings. When she sat down at the table she pulled a bowie-knife out of her belt and placed it alongside her plate. "She's from California, you know," was the comment she heard on every hand.

Why Nat Goodwin Smiles

If the story which I am credibly informed is true proves to have a good foundation, Nat Goodwin must be laughing in his sleeve at the stories which have recently been circulated concerning his separation from his wife—a separation said by the newspaper gossips to be personal as well as professional. I have it on the best authority, with which Nat has nothing to do, that Mrs. Goodwin is with friends in the East awaiting a very important domestic event, for she does not intend to let her little sister Gertrude get ahead of her and Gertrude is the adoring mother of a small and winsome daughter.

Perhaps it is the program situation, perhaps it is the Goodwin fate, to have the old-time rumor, "Nat and his wife are going to separate," floating like a comet over his circuit. And the cause assigned? Why, the proverbial woman. But all the same the acquaintances of the comedian who give ear to the rumor point to his failure this week to appear in Sacramento as billed and his hasty dark brown trip back to this city as one of the unfailing signs that the domestic felicity of the star has somehow slipped a cog.

Livernash Was Not Whitewashed

From the Examiner's account of the proceedings of the Labor Council on the occasion of the investigation of the case of Congressman Livernash who was caught red-handed in the act of buying socks at an "unfair" haberdasher's, it appeared that he was whitewashed. The fact is that the investigation resulted unsatisfactorily to the erratic newspaper man. He pleaded that he was in a preoccupied mood when he was accosted by the union men who notified him of the character of the store, and that their conduct was so offensive that it aroused his indignation. He argued that labor leaders should not be expected to follow strictly all union rules, because there were more important matters that engrossed their attention. His friends sought to have the Council express its confidence in him by a vote, but emphatic objections were raised, and the vote was not taken. It is now the privilege of the Retail Clerks' Union to take any action in the matter that its members may deem proper.

The Governor Is Grateful

Governor Pardee appointed Guy Barham a Bank Commissioner despite the bitter opposition of the anti-Gage element in Los Angeles. Barham was really entitled to the job, for it was at his earnest solicitation that Gage caused the publication of a despatch on the morning of the election calling for his friends to rally to the support of the Republican candidate. It will be remembered that up to that time Gage had been sulking in his tent, and that his friends were either apathetic or violently opposing Pardee. Since the election it has been conceded by many of Pardee's friends that he could not have been elected if Gage had not sent that despatch. In appointing Barham, Pardee testified his gratitude to the man who had induced Gage to break silence.

Political Conference at Tahoe

Abe Ruef stole quietly away last week to the shores of Lake Tahoe, ostensibly for the purpose of enjoying a summer outing, but his disappearance from his usual haunts was contemporaneous with the departure of John Lynch, the Revenue Collector, who has been actively engaged in calming the tempestuous waters of the Republican pond. I do not know whether the two leaders had an assignation up in the Sierras, but the fact is that they met at Tallac and held a conference among the tall pines. The little bird that brought back the news is authority for the statement that Lynch and Ruef went to Tahoe to talk over the Mayoralty, and that they failed to settle the question as to whom they should nominate. Ruef is, of course, intent on securing the Republican nomination for Schmitz, but Lynch thinks that Speaker Fisk should be the Republican standard bearer. They parted with the understanding that the subject would not be taken up for discussion until after the primaries.

Will Have a Private Auto Road

The set of millionaires who have palatial homes up on the McCloud river spend money so lavishly but so quietly that the gush writers of the society columns never even hear the clink of it. Their latest expenditure is a private automobile road which is to circle some eighteen miles and be a private thoroughfare for those who have contributed to build the road. Mrs. Hearst is not an auto enthusiast but she is one of those who have helped to build the new roadway and Charles Stetson Wheeler, the well known attorney, who has a home on the McCloud, is another who has enthusiastically given aid to it. Fancy the joy unconfined of the autoist who will be able to whirr over this road as fast as the machine can puff without seeing speed ordinances on every tree and stone. But the road will be barred to the ordinary autofarer for the people who have built intend to use it exclusively for themselves and friends.

Dined His Guests a la Hunter

While the homes of the McCloud colony are as costly as anything down Blingum way they are furnished with an eye to simplicity; any attempt at display is not tolerated. One wealthy gentleman who has a home up there that cost eighty thousand dollars in the building has it equipped in the severest fashion. He believes that there should be neither fuss nor feathers about a summer home. He always dines on an oilcloth covered table and uses this same primitive napery no matter how distinguished his guests may be. Last summer Mrs. Hearst was entertaining a party of her Eastern friends at her partly finished home on the McCloud and this believer in the simple mode of summering invited the whole party to dinner, served as per custom on oilcloth. The dinner consisted of fish and game caught on his own preserves and cooked a la hunter's style. The guests, needless to say, enjoyed it tremendously, particularly as they knew it was not gotten up for their benefit but was mine host's usual manner of dining.

Will Help Support Hubby Now

If Lady Sholto Douglas ever becomes a great actress those who knew her in Bakersfield when she was a poor, struggling dance-hall artist, will be writing startling reminiscences about her. The fair Loretta is going upon the regular stage, having taken a course of study at Mrs. Nelson Wheatcroft's one-two-three school. She will thus be enabled to give financial aid to her husband, the noble Lord Sholto, whose Washington saloon is said to have exhausted the remains of his inheritance. Lord Sholto's father was the late Marquis of Queensberry, a name celebrated in sporting annals. Not everybody, by the way, knows just how the marriage of the dancing Loretta and Sholto came about. The young lord was visiting some English friends of his who had a ranch near Bakersfield. The ranch owner fell ill and his wife's attention was consequently monopolized. She had little time to give to her guest. Lord Sholto fell into the habit of making daily and tri-daily trips to Bakersfield, and naturally visited its little theatre. There he first saw Loretta. Their marriage followed.

The Retort Acidulous

A certain matron of the upper set in San Rafael is disapproved in certain quarters on account of her ultra-exclusive airs and haughty demeanor. There is a tale floating around that at one time she was a needlewoman in Santa Rosa. Most of her acquaintances do not think the less of her for that while others believe that such an experience in the struggle of life ought to make her more tolerant of the feelings of others. The other day she happened to meet socially with one of her old customers. The self-made grande dame failed to recognize her. The latter's sweet smile of greeting melted into a look of extreme embarrassment, for several nearby ladies had noted the situation.

"You—you don't remember me?" she said.

"Oh, one meets so many people nowadays, you know," the grande dame replied, loftily.

"Yes," responded the other quickly, "especially among tradespeople and the working classes."

And they parted, each striving to show that nothing had happened.

From a private letter I learn that Alice Neilsen is in Sorrento, Italy, where she is playing a successful operatic engagement. She is billed for Naples next. She has appeared in four new roles, that of Marguerite among them, and has refused all offers to return to English opera.

Newport's smart set is said to be quite charmed by a talkative parrot introduced by the versatile Mr. Lehr. Having given gush society a monkey whose manners it aped, he is doubtless now bent on introducing a bird whose conversation it may copy.

Singular Hold-Up in Oakland

There was an extraordinary hold-up in the Berkeley hills the other day, stray details of which have floated through the college town, but the whole story has not yet been pieced together by the gossips, so discreetly have the principals in the affair muffled themselves in silence. However I have heard a reliable account of the escapade that places some of the scions of aristocratic homes in the class of Dick Turpins. Several days ago a party of ladies and gentlemen started off on a walking trip through the San Ramon valley behind Piedmont. They belong to Berkeley's "outdoor" set, the set that prides itself on leading simple, natural lives in spite of the fact that Fate has put them in possession of easeful wealth. The fact that people that owned their own carriages and automobiles were going to tramp by day and sleep on the ground at night aroused very little comment, for such things are not out of plumb these unconventional days.

Frightened the Women

At dusk the first night out the men of the party left the ladies while they went forward to make a big bonfire. When they were some distance from camp the ladies were suddenly startled by a fusilade of gun shots on the hillside. At first they supposed the shots were fired by belated hunters. Suddenly, with wild whoops and Indian yells a half-dozen boys came tearing down the hill waving their guns as they rushed pell-mell on the frightened women. The young Duvals were all closely masked and the ringleader shouted "Hands up!" in approved bandit style. The startled screams and protestations of the women were interrupted by an order to hand over money and jewelry. This was promptly done. The youthful road agents were excitedly pocketing their swag preparatory to stealing away when there was another interruption. Some of the gentlemen, having felt that the ladies might be alarmed at the shooting thought it wise to hasten back to camp and forestall any nervousness. They were almost as much surprised by the sight that met them as the women had been by the boys. In a jiffy they made a rush at the young rascals, but the latter melted away in the undergrowth and in the semi-darkness they escaped. One of them happened to lose his hat bearing a silver marker engraved with his name. That name stands for something in Oakland. One of the ladies happened to be a friend of the mother of its household. Then followed a pretty ado.

Cornering the Culprits

The tramp was ended right there, and early next morning the whole party returned and a special committee of two was sent to Oakland to make inquiries and incidentally to tell the tale of the lost hat. It transpired that the hat's owner was supposed by the mother to be camping somewhere in the San Ramon valley with a company of young friends. A carriage was hastily sent for him. No one doubted at first that if the young owner of the hat was really mixed up in the raid it must have been planned as a hoax. But when he was brought home, what was the amazement of everybody when he flatly denied all connection with the affair. Close, sharp questioning and the production of his hat finally drove him into a corner and he finally confessed everything. Of course all the money and jewelry was quickly recovered and the greatest efforts were made to hush up the story. Those connected with the affair explain it among themselves as the prank of unrestrained youth, something in psychology.

A group of sonnets entitled "Love's Crucifix: Nine Sonnets and a Canzone from Petrarch," by Agnes Tobin, preface by Alice Meynell, has just been issued by William Heinemann of London. The work is very highly spoken of by the critics. In her preface Mrs. Meynell says, "Petrarch's love story has no doubt been burlesqued by the modern sense of humor; he in his day foresaw and feared no mockery. What he feared was theological rebuke, and he argued the matter out with his conscience until he died." This work is part of that accomplished by the two friends during Mrs. Meynell's late visit with the Tobins.

She Really Married Him

Few who read the announcement last January of Miss Beryl Whitney's engagement with Thomas H. Graydon believed that the betrothal would end in the marriage before six months had passed by. The engagement was the sequel to a little romance rather out of the common. In November of last year Miss Whitney, one of Miss Ely's school girls, for a bit of an escapade with two girl chums was rusticated in a little out of the way village under a duenna's guard. The girls found it rather slow, until Miss Whitney sent a message to her old friend Tom Graydon, the Harvard athlete, to come down and cheer them up. Graydon's spirit was equal to the occasion; he answered the summons tout de suite, palmed himself off on the credulous duenna as Beryl's brother and in that fraternal disguise managed to help his little sister and her friends pass their rustication in a lively fashion. The denouement came, as retribution generally does, and the newspapers got the story. But it seems the young people truly loved each other, and Miss Beryl's relatives were finally induced to forgive their naughty, daring daughter to the extent of permitting an engagement with the Harvard man. The engagement, as I said, was announced last January but nothing more was heard out here of the wedding preparations. Not long ago Mrs. Daisy Parrott Whitney, Beryl's sister-in-law, announced that Miss Whitney would visit California this summer. The few eligible bachelors left in San Fran-

"Lucky" Baldwin's New Venture

"Lucky" Baldwin is in a fair way of getting stoutly on his financial feet again with the starting of his new city of Arcadia. He has laid out plans for a city twelve miles square on his Santa Anita ranch, and has made claim to the Los Angeles county supervisors that the site contains the requisite population of five hundred inhabitants. On this showing they have given him permission to call an election for the purpose of incorporating the new town. A hard fight was made against granting him this permission. It was suspected that "Lucky" had one of his pet schemes in view to launch a winter racing resort of mastodonic proportions and that a wide-open town garnished with every kind of a game that an intrepid human could possibly run against would be simply a side-show of his contemplated Babylon.

His Last Load of Gay Girls

Nearby towns declared he would corrupt the whole community. They recalled his steamer load of gay girls, gauze and gambling paraphernalia, which he sailed north with to found a new town near Nome. They charged that all the so-called inhabitants which he had marshaled to populate his new Arcadia were his touts, retainers, hirelings and stuffed dummies, and were ready to do his bidding on any kind of a job. Anyhow, they didn't want a man like him to acquire powers, "like a Russian Czar," under the act of incorporation. Baldwin called them "long hairs," declared they were jealous and were trying to keep capital from developing that section of the country. Evidently Baldwin has learned the proper way to invest his capital for he has been allowed to go ahead with his improvements and Arcadia, in big red letters, will soon be on the map. How much or how little racing and gambling will be conducted there the prospectuses as yet don't proclaim. But it's safe to say that under Czar Baldwin's management Arcadia will be the ultra-roseate capital of the hottest section of Southern California.

Greatest Gambler of His Day

"Ham" Baker, who has just died was, according to "Lucky" Baldwin who knew him well, the greatest faro dealer of his day. In the early 90's Baker was caught in a railroad wreck and badly crippled. After the smash-up he never touched the bank. "Thirty years ago," recounted the horseman, "Baker had seven of the greatest gambling houses in America bidding for his services at salaries ranging from two thousand to four thousand five hundred dollars a month. John Morrissey got him for four summers at the Saratoga Club for twenty thousand dollars. But the time I knew 'Ham' Baker best was in Virginia City, where for six years he was dealer in the greatest faro games in the world. I believe his salary was fifty dollars a night and fifteen per cent of the profits of the house. He made something like ten thousand dollars a year out of his job. But he died poor; he was an invalid for years after he came out of the Colorado railroad wreck and you know what that means to a bank account. But he was in the heyday of his glory when he dealt faro in the early '70's for Gentry and Crittenden who owned the finest gambling house on the Comstock. Many a time I've seen him handle eighty thousand dollars a day there. Once I saw him dealing in a game where one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars went back and forth across the table in one night.

Lost a Fortune at One Sitting

"One day a miner named Bilson, worth a million, came in from Utah. 'Give me a stack of thousand dollar fish,' he said. Baker handed them over. One thousand went on the jack and was lost. Bilson lost over ten thousand dollars without winning a bet. He tapped a bottle of champagne, bought another stack, and tackled the game again. Along about one o'clock luck was swinging his way and before two he was fifty thousand dollars ahead. But it swung dead against him after he made a call for one thousand dollars and picked up five thousand. As the day was breaking he played his last chip. He lost. As he kicked over his chair he said, 'Ham, that ends this jamboree, how much do I owe you?' 'Forty-two thousand dollars,' said Baker, counting up. Bilson went over to the desk and wrote out a check for that amount. That was the day of fast play and big bets. Men wanted quick action on their money and 'Ham' was put there to give it to them.

straight up to 'Ham' and said: 'Say, Ham, this looks like a sick game. How much have you got in the box, anyhow?' 'Oh, just about something like thirty-six thousand dollars, and that's thirty-six thousand dollars more than you've got sand enough to try and win.' 'I'll go you,' said Jim. 'I've got thirty thousand dollars on deposit in the Pacific bank. I'll put up the check for it,' and he walked over to the desk and wrote out the order. Back he came and dropped it on a card. 'The whole thing goes,' he said, 'the king to win.' 'All right,' said 'Ham.' Of course everybody stopped playing and the whole crowd gathered about the board to watch the outcome. Baker began to move the cards. At the fourth turn he stopped. 'King of clubs wins,' he said, in a matter-of-fact way. 'Good enough,' exclaimed Sharon. He called for champagne for the crowd but Baker insisted on being the host. 'I'll be around tomorrow and give you another rattle,' said Sharon, as he went out the door. And that's the way they gambled when 'Ham' Baker was in his prime."

"Why did Gayboy marry such a thin woman?"

"Oh, he loves sea bathing, but he hates to have his wife wearing those decollete bathing gowns."

Will Dip His Pen in Tabasco

Monsieur Mabilleau, the French savant who gave a course of lectures at the University of California during commencement week, is said to be writing a brochure on America and it does not take a clairvoyant mind to predict that he will dip his pen in tabasco when it comes to the chapter on a western university. The distinguished Frenchman came to this country at the invitation of Mr. Hyde of New York and his lectures at Harvard created so much favorable discussion that Mr. Charles Alexander arranged for them to be repeated out here. The lectures fell at an inopportune time for commencement week is always crop full of "doings," but there were enough people interested outside of college to sparsely fill Hearst Hall. There were never more than two or three members of the faculty present at any one of the lectures and President Wheeler, in his capacity as appendage to Roosevelt, probably never once gave a thought to the distinguished lecturer. The cavalier manner in which their brilliant countryman was treated at the first lecture roused the ire of the French colony some of whom tried to induce Monsieur Mabilleau to decline to deliver the rest of the series. On the occasion of his first impassioned exposition of the true condition of women in France a number of students were practicing in the same building for their extravaganza and their disconcerting noise must have annoyed the lecturer even more than it did his audience.

Bowed Out in a Clatter of Dishes

It was thought that the committee who had charge of the lectures would surely prevent further annoyance of this sort and reserve Hearst Hall exclusively for Monsieur Mabilleau during the hour of his lecture. But President Wheeler had evidently not even taken the pains to appoint some one to look after Monsieur Mabilleau's comfort, and some variation of this sort of annoyance was repeated every day. It culminated in positive disrespect at the last lecture when the speaker's voice could scarcely be heard above the clatter of the caterers in the hall below, who were moving in paraphernalia for the reception President and Mrs. Wheeler were to give that night. There was a great deal of outspoken comment afterwards on the discourteous treatment the famous Frenchman received and those who witnessed it can not hope that Monsieur Mabilleau's impressions of Western culture and education will reflect favorably on California.

Went to War with a "Beecher Bible"

According to the press the public has lost, in the passing of Major Pond, "the most remarkable manager of celebrities the world has ever seen." The list of the celebrities whose tours he managed is really the list of all the great orators, singers, authors, artists, travelers, humorists and lecturers who appeared in this country during his business life. He managed them all from the time of Henry Ward Beecher to Booker T. Washington. He knew more prominent people intimately than any other man in the land. His life was eventful from the time when, as a lad, he went to Wisconsin and carried away by the sentiment around him, engaged in underground slave running. In 1856, at the age of eighteen, he joined John Brown in his famous raid. As a member of the band he carried one of the Sharp's rifles knows as the Beecher Bible, for the reason that the guns were shipped west by Abolitionists as Bibles. Three years later he was among the pioneers who made the rush to Colorado and Pike's Peak. Within two years he had enlisted in the cavalry and with a hundred thousand others was trying to capture Richmond and the South. He was one of the seventeen survivors out of one hundred and eighteen Union cavalrymen who were attacked by Quantrell in the Baxter Springs massacre. Later on he appeared in Utah as the proprietor of its first Gentile paper, The Salt Lake Tribune. Then his life-work began.

How He Began His Career

When Ann Eliza Young apostatized, Major Pond was delegated to go with her to Washington, where she told her story of Mormonism to Congress. At once the genius of the Major as a manager began to shine. He quickly realized the possibility of making money with Ann Young as a lecturer. He stopped at Denver for a trial. "I got the school room," he used to say, "and charged one dollar and a half for a ticket. I sold four hundred tickets, and that six hundred dollars—well, it was an eye-opener for me as to what might be done in the lecture field. I believe I've worked it pretty well since." The Major had countless delightful anecdotes on the celebrities he had managed. Once he had a contract with Mark Twain in which it was stipulated that the humorist was "to be kept moving" on the road. "At a little town in Minnesota," the Major used to recount. "We had been kept waiting for a train since four o'clock in the morning.

Mark Twain's Contract

"Mark began to grow uneasy and finally said, 'I'm tired of this business, Pond. You contracted with me to travel and here you keep me waiting for late trains that never arrive.' Mrs. Twain expostulated with him for his remark, but he persisted in his stand and said, 'I contracted with Pond to travel and I insist on his carrying out his contract.' 'All right,' I said, 'I'm willing to give you all the traveling you want if you'll tell me how to do it. This station has no wheels on it so I can't trundle you.' But he got around the difficulty by sitting on a wheelbarrow, and he never ceased growling at me for breaking my contract till I began to wheel him up and down the platform."

Urmy's Powers of Conquest

Clarence T. Urmy, the musician and poet, whose verses have figured in a divorce suit in San Jose, is said in appearance to fall short of the ideal one would set for an author of such charming verses. As a conversationalist he is not gifted with those powers that win the worship of the matinee lunch girl. Through his poems, however, he could not be much more fascinating, and he is certain to have been credited with the conquest of at least one woman.

Modjeska's Professional Vanity

Madame Modjeska's return to live in California brings back to us one of the most picturesque of our distinguished foreign residents. Count Bozenta, her husband, is a remarkably handsome Polish nobleman. He married her when she was a young girl, and contrary to the accepted rule of stage marriages they have lived in childlike happiness. Modjeska, however, has all the money and their palatial country place, Arden near Pasadena, is hers by purchase. A kindly woman by nature, Madame Modjeska has done more than most successful actresses to help young and ambitious girls toward prominence on the stage. Two San Francisco society girls, one of whom was Miss Young, whose father was stationed at the Presidio, came under the notice of the tragedienne with the result that their progress was remarkably rapid. However, the former queen of tragedy is not lacking in the vanities of her profession. One of these is the common Thespian yearning to hold centre stage even when in company. Before she last went abroad she was a guest at a Southern California hotel. The day before her departure the leader of the band composed a piece in her honor and invited her to be in the audience when it was first played. She was there on the front seat with her Count and sat quietly enough until her piece struck up. Along about the middle of it she showed signs of uneasiness. Finally she arose, carefully tied her husband's necktie, kept the pose with her face toward the audience for an effective moment, and then sat down.

Emil Steinegger, who has been studying under Leschetitsky and other Vienna masters for four years, has returned home. He is at present visiting his parents in Fruitvale.

LADIES WILL HAVE A FEAST.

For the next few weeks the ladies of this city will have what may be called a feast among the choicest line of Ladies' Cloaks, Suits, and Wraps. They are to be closed out at the removal sale of Kelly & Liebes, 120 Kearny street, which will take place next Monday. It is reported that all the goods will be sold out before moving into their fine new building, which is to be the handsomest west of Chicago. Hence, prices must be extremely low.

What Is His Explanation?

The Italian colony is trying vainly to discover why Signor Edmondo Mayor des Planches failed to visit them before returning to Italy on July eleventh, as he has planned. Washington diplomatic circles are also very much interested in the question. It may require more explanation to the Italian foreign office than the Ambassador Planches press agents at Washington have been able to suggest. The fact is, an important part of this new diplomat's duties is to look well to the interests of all King Victor's American subjects, and especially to visit and encourage the wine growers of California. At frequent intervals since last autumn the Ambassador has been announcing a proposed western visit and even went so far as to arrange his itinerary from St. Louis to California, on the dedication of the Exposition buildings; but, as he has since confided to the world, the hotel accommodations provided at St. Louis were so distasteful as to necessitate his immediate return to his commodious quarters at the Embassy in Washington, so his California trip was "temporarily" shelved. As the Ambassador must sail for Rome next week on business with the King's ministers those most interested here are wondering how the pleasure-loving representative is going to explain his dodging the official visit to California.

Cured of a Rattlesnake Bite

Young Harvey Blair's remarkable escape after having been badly bitten by a rattlesnake has set the snake sharps to discussing rattlers' venom and hairbreadth escapes from the reptiles. Young Blair will have as good story as any of them to tell all his life. He was visiting friends in the Yucaipa valley and was out with them in the brush, one day, when he saw what he thought was a prettily marked stick. He stooped to pick it up and the snake struck his hand a vicious blow. His friends rushed him to the house, dosed him with whisky, and then raced him to the doctor, some twenty miles away. Antidotes were given, and now he is reported on the way to recovery.

Curious Experiments With Venom

"Rattlesnake bites and rattlesnake poison injected into the blood are two very different things, as the Carnegie Institute specialists are just now proving," said Dr. Sayers, in discussing young Blair's escape. "The institute, you know, has two physicians who are in the midst of experimenting on the poisons of rattlesnakes, cobras, moccasins, gila monsters and other poisonous reptiles. They chloroform the rattlers, open their jaws, and squeeze out the poison between their thumb and forefinger. The venom is thus collected in vials and used for experimenting. It is of a yellow color and thick as molasses. In the experiments with live animals the venom is injected hypodermically for reasons that will be interesting to those who live in dread of rattlesnakes. The first reason is that a rattler does not always strike effectively when he tries to poison you. Sometimes he fails to elevate his fangs sufficiently to inject into the victim more than a drop or two of poison. Sometimes he strikes fiercely and his teeth are actually fastened for a moment in the flesh, but the fangs with their poison ducts are doubled backward and not a drop of venom is injected into the wound. Yet, to all appearances, the bite has been a terrible one.

Way the Venom Works

"One of the attendants on the experimenters was bitten by accident several months ago. In a few minutes he became sick at the stomach and very weak. His face paled and a cold sweat broke out on him, his breathing was hurried and his pulse feeble. This was the first stage of the attack; during all this time the wound gave no pain. In the second stage—the stage of recovery—the wound was painful. The man was pulled through without trouble. On small animals the effect of a small dose of venom is almost immediately fatal. A pigeon, for instance, on receiving an injection of three or four drops, walks a few steps, crouches, gasps, rolls over on its side and in one or two minutes is stone dead. On a large animal, such as dogs, the poison does not act so powerfully. A thirty-one-pound bulldog bitten on the thigh by a rattler lost the power of its legs in fifty minutes, in eighty minutes it was breathing heavily, and at the end of three hours it was dead.

Greatest Remedy Yet Found

"These experiments have shown so far that the antidotes usually recommended for snake bite are worthless. The experimenters regard alcohol, taken internally, as valuable—not as an antidote, but as a stimulant. Persons bitten by snakes can take extraordinary quantities of whiskey or brandy—two quarts in an hour without exhibiting a sign of drunkenness. It has been tried on animals with good effect. In every case it has done much to tide the victim over the stage of prostration that follows the snake bite. The remedial agent that is of the greatest known value is the intermittent ligature—the tight band, drawn about the wounded limb, that is loosened for an instant at stated intervals, thus allowing the poison to enter the system gradually in tiny quantities. The system combats the poison well where this ligature is used; and alcohol, given each time the band is loosened, helps much to counteract the weakening effect of the entering venom. Snake poison, taken into the stomach, is as harmless as bread. Snakes have been made to swallow their own venom, and no evil results have followed. Injected into the blood, however, a snake's venom will kill another snake — will even kill itself."

The Same Old "Dooley"

Newspaper rumor places Mr. Finley Peter Dunne "Dooley" at the head of the New York Morning Telegraph as managing editor. This will be no new work for Mr. Dunne as it was he who lifted the Chicago Evening Journal out of the slough of bankruptcy and placed it on a paying basis after three months' management. It is not generally known that in addition to the "Dooley" papers, Mr. Dunne has also contributed pithy editorials to Collier's for some time. He is now a fixed star in the Harper galaxy. Mr. Dunne's first appearance as a managing editor was had with the Chicago Sunday Post at a time when literary excellence was at a discount and subscribers were few and far between. It is told of him that, one afternoon, hearing the strains of a funeral march in the street below the office, he called an associate to the window to view the cortege. After contemplating the procession for some time he pensively remarked, "I wonder if that's our subscriber."

"So you've soured on married life already, Thrifty. What's the matter?"

"Matrimonial dyspepsia. She was too rich for me, after all."

Will Try His Luck in the East

Jack Wilson, connected with the Tivoli for several years as a singer, as press agent, and librettist, will leave for the East on Monday. He has turned out no end of topical verses for its operas, and is known in the theatrical world as one of the most prolific producers of this kind of work. He has constructed no less than nine pieces for the Tivoli and has had a hand in building up many more. He has also done good work in the serious song line. Wilson has a number of operas and one drama to spring on the Eastern managers; judging from the value of his past work they should succeed. Anna Wilson, his pretty and accomplished wife, will accompany him.

Willing to Help Her

Has Mrs. Bowditch Morton stage aspirations? Those who are acquainted with the wife of the house-doctor at Del Monte claim that she has aspirations in that line. She has influential relatives by marriage in New York and rumor has it that they are more than willing to help her to attain success.

Study All Kinds of Crimes

"Russian methods are altogether different from our own," said Colonel Truax, who has been studying the surveillance system of that country for the Philadelphia authorities and is passing through here on his way home. "The Russian police fit Russia all right but they wouldn't do here. At the same time I must admit that our police, fine as they are for the necessities of this country, would have a hard time coping with criminal conditions as they exist in the land of the Tartar. In St. Petersburg there is a policeman's college where applicants are regularly trained for the force. There is a museum attached to the school where the students of criminal ways make themselves thoroughly familiar with the tools of the criminal. They study jimmies, drills, chisels and contrivances for robbing collection boxes, a special field much developed by the Russian thieves. The Russian passport system is likewise carefully taught them. The duties of the dvorniks, a sort of assistant police, are schooled into them. These dvorniks keep watch on all private residences, report on the habits of the tenants, their visitors, examine the papers of all newcomers and direct them to report themselves at the police station. In Russia one can scarcely stir without bumping into some sort of an inquisitive policeman, who wants to know all about your identity and your comings and goings. In this country such inquisition would not be tolerated. That's one of the few reasons why the police systems of the two countries must of necessity be so different."

Raphael Weill will leave for Paris next Friday.

Viola Piercy's Way

The unostentatious "surprise" marriage of Viola Piercy and "Babe" Burnett Wednesday was not so surprising to those who understand the bride's character. Miss Piercy has always done things quietly, without making any how-de-do about them. She never made a formal debut in society, but went about a deal with her aunt, Jennie Dunphy. Ever since the sad and sudden deaths of her mother and father, Sam Piercy the actor, Viola has lived with her aunt. Miss Dunphy, whom rumor said might have married her brother-in-law had fate not intervened, devoted her life to the child. She took her abroad and saw that she received the best of education. Little Viola's tastes ran largely to books, and she took a course of special study at Stanford to satisfy her longings for the higher education. The young bridegroom is a Stanford man, and the wedding can be set down as another of those college romances that are of late enlivening prosaic matrimonial annals all over the country. The bride is an heiress, having inherited wealth from her parents; besides she will probably have her aunt's share of the Dunphy estate. There is little possibility that Jennie Dunphy will ever leave single blessedness. She had two romances and both ended in the grave.

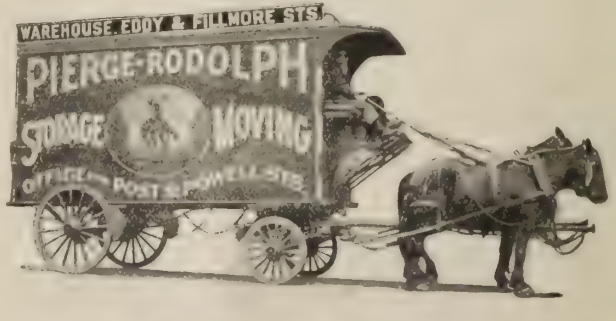
Was a Star Athlete

Burnett still bears the ironical college nickname of "Babe" because of his large build; he is one of the handsomest physical specimens in California, and he made a record at Stanford as a star centre rush in several victorious games against Berkeley. Burnett's father is a cattle owner in the interior of the State and the boy came to college fresh off the range with a head for Latin and an arm for football that surprised his companions. When the Spanish war broke out he enlisted in a company of Volunteer cavalry as a sergeant and passed the best physical examination of any California recruit.

Her Opinion of Society's Leader

A SanFrancisco girl who knows her Washington even as the Washington girl knows her New York was discussing the rumor that is being circulated to the effect that Alice Roosevelt and her stepmother get along about as well as the proverbial step-relations. A lot of people were sitting on the Hopkins veranda at the time and those who had met Alice Roosevelt agreed with the oracle in laying the blame on her and not on Mrs. Roosevelt. Any one who has met Alice Roosevelt socially a half dozen times has felt the sting of her manner which is harder to bear than her words. When she is with the Astor set she plays on being the President's daughter and when she is with the official set she affects great disdain for the chances of politics and lays stress on her birthright to the Astor set. Naturally this has endeared her to neither set.

Bohemia's New Book



"Uncle" George Bromley is writing the story of his life. The volume is a record of the personal experiences of Bohemia's patriarch. It covers Connecticut, California in early days, South Africa, China and modern New York. "The Long Ago and The Later On" is its title. Those who have seen the manuscript say that it is a very entertaining autobiography, full of the anecdotes that interest all kinds of readers.

King Edward's Favorite

It is a romantic story the London correspondents have told about the attempt to burglarize the home of Mrs. George Keppel. At first they reported that the burglars were common, every-day crooks whose purpose was to steal the jewels of the society queen. Later on the story leaked out that "the real object of the burglars was to get possession for blackmailing purposes of letters which it is alleged Mrs. Keppel receives every day from a very exalted personage." And the London police imparted a soupcon of Sherlock Holmes mystery to the affair by stating that the crime was planned by a titled crook, in all probability there is no mystery as to the "very exalted personage" whose correspondence was the motif of the burglary. He is none other than His Majesty Edward VII. The correspondents very generously refrained from mentioning his name, but all London has for years taken a deep interest in the frisky King's love affair. All London loves a lover in proportion to his rank, and I believe that the esteem in which Albert Edward is held by his subjects is heightened not only by the circumstance of his being the first gentleman in Europe but also by the number of affaires du coeur that salted his salad days and spiced his later years. According to club gossip in London Mrs. Keppel is the very latest of the King's long unexpurgated list of favorites.

The King Can Do No Wrong

At the time of Albert Edward's accession to the throne several of the London journalists took occasion to announce that he had become a model husband, having some years before turned from the primrose path. They probably supposed that time had tempered his affections to the platonic degree, for of course they knew that Mrs. Keppel contributed to the gayety of his lighter hours. They were not unaware of the story that Sir Thomas Lipton, who enjoys the King's confidence, had relieved Mrs. Keppel of an encumbrance by making her husband manager of his tea agency in New York. But firmly believing that the King could do no wrong they were quite convinced that Mrs. Keppel was merely fulfilling the office of a loyal subject. However they did not regard the relationship existing between them as a proper subject for discussion, and the London papers suppressed part of the news a year ago when the King had a narrow escape from a serious accident on board the Shamrock II, on the occasion of a trial trip. They mentioned the accident but not the fact that Mrs. Keppel was on board unchaperoned. It is not unlikely, however, that they felt that when a young married woman is in the company of Grandpa Edward there is absolutely no need of a chaperon. But the club gossips will gossip, for they prefer to regard their King as an able-bodied monarch and they abominate platonic romances. Hence the plausibility of the story about the titled crook who planned a burglary to secure the letters of an exalted personage for blackmailing purposes. Mrs. Keppel, by the way, is the same Englishwoman who was so hospitably received by Newport society last season. Our American snobs are proud of the privilege of honoring a King's platonic favorite.

Failed in the Romeo Act

From a popular summer resort near Healdsburg comes the story of an amorous swain who tried to scale a latticed balcony and succeeded in sadly frightening two timorous Demoiselles. The young ladies are very well known about the bay and were chaperoned by the wife of a distant relative, a man who stands high in the Board of Trade. The smitten man is very wealthy. Indeed he is credited with owning most of the hills and vales in the immediate vicinity of the resort and also to have some sort of a mortgage on that place. During the summer he spends most of his time with his wife and children in their beautiful home nearby. Last season he happened to visit the resort at a time when one of the young ladies was also a guest there. His attentions to her were most marked and kept the gossips in a flutter of excitement. Her relatives deemed it prudent to cut matters short by taking her away from the place. This season as soon as the wealthy Benedict heard of her advent he quickly reappeared on the scene and set the tongues of the gossips busy with his undisguised attentions. The party were assigned to a cottage near the hotel, the room of the two young ladies being off the front balcony on the second floor. One night last week there was a jolly dinner given by the rural Benedict and all kinds of toasts were enthusiastically drunk. Soon after the guests dispersed the matronly chaperon thought she heard burglars trying to climb the lattice of the porch and she called for assistance. The first to respond was the rural Benedict. He was so—well, so voluble in his offerings of assistance that the chaperon indignantly summoned her charges early next morning and departed from the place. All might have gone well if the elderly Romeo hadn't made the mistake of explaining that it was all a mistake.

Were Not Dressmakers' Models

In reciting, last week, the family connections of Miss Lily May, whose engagement in Paris to Lord Bagot was recently announced, it was stated, through inadvertence, that her two sisters-in-law, the Misses Coleman, nieces of William O'Brien, had one time been employed as models in a New York costumer's establishment. The error occurred through confounding them with members of another family to whom they bear not the slightest relationship. My attention having been called to the matter I hasten to make the correction, though I know that both women, notwithstanding their high social standing, are of such a democratic temperament that it would cause them no pain to suggest that they were once engaged in honest toil.

Oelrichs Warmly Welcomed at Del Monte

Hermann Oelrichs received the welcome of a matinee idol when he arrived at Del Monte. He is always depended on to introduce something novel in the season's itinerary of pleasures. Just now, however, he is not bothering about anything like that, but is giving his time to golf and salmon fishing. Golf is as much in favor as ever. At the clock golf tournament given by the Parker Whitneys, Bertha Dolbeer made the highest score. Quite a batch of smart people have gone down to stay over the Fourth at Del Monte—the Homer Kings and Frank King, W. D. Bourn and family, Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Horace Hill and family. Clinton E. Worden is settled at the hotel with his family for the entire summer. Mrs. J. O. Oyster and family are also there for the season.

Takes the Bridal Belt

Heretofore Fort Miley has rather held the belt as possessing, for its size, so many brides among its residents. But Fort Baker is now looming up as a possible rival, for it seems that Mrs. Cloke (Alice Findley) whose marriage took place so recently at Sausalito, is to share the honors of bride at that post to which she and Captain Harold Cloke have just returned from their honeymoon trip. The wedding of Miss Eleanor McCaskey and Captain Arthur S. Conklin, of the Coast Artillery, U. S. A., will soon take place at Fort Sheridan, Ill., where the father of the bride elect, Colonel William S. McCaskey of the Twentieth Infantry, is stationed. Captain Conklin will bring his bride to Fort Baker.

A lady who may almost come under the head of bride, her marriage was so recent, has been added to the Army ladies at Fort Mason. She is the wife of Doctor Henry Page, U. S. A., surgeon on duty at Fort Mason, and was Miss Edith Greenleaf, daughter of Colonel Charles R. Greenleaf, U. S. A., retired; so she was born, brought up, and has married in the service.

The following named well known officers in the Army are stopping at an up-town hotel: Major Ogden Rafferty of the Medical Department, and Mrs. Rafferty; Major and Mrs. Payson; Major and Mrs. Krauthoff; Major Edgar H. Mearns; and Major F. H. Hardie, Fourteenth Cavalry. Those of the Navy include Admiral and Mrs. Miller and family, and Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. William S. Hughes.

Flittings About the Summer Resorts

Mrs. Herbert Moffitt has just returned from the Rudolph Spreckels ranch in Sonoma and is going to Tahoe for two months.

Mrs. H. M. A. Miller is at Blythedale and will later go to Del Monte to finish the season.

Mrs. Henry Stern has just left for a visit to Tallac.

Mrs. F. A. Pfingst is entertaining a large jolly house party "over the Fourth," at Watsonville.

Mr. and Mrs. Lilienthal and Miss Vic are spending the Fourth at Tahoe.

Dr. Herzstein is taking his vacation rest on the lake.

Mrs. I. N. Walter has taken her family to Belvedere.

Miss Allie Meyer, a sister of Mrs. Sig Stern, is coming on from New York and will join the family at Tahoe.

Claims to be His Widow

My New York correspondent writes that when Walter W. Watrous, clubman and a much favored parti in his youthful society days, died in the fore part of the week, his friends were surprised to hear of his marriage with Mrs. Katherine Ballou. Her sister, Mrs. Maud Spencer of San Francisco, is now in New York. The Watrous family at once repudiated the declared marriage and a legal tangle is being prepared by the lawyers who are waving previous and subsequent wills at one another. "Mrs. Maud" is acting as the spokeswoman for sister Katherine and she has kindly furnished the press with all interviews.

William Sproule, Freight Traffic Manager of the Southern Pacific and one time president of the Bohemian Club, left today for Chicago, where he is to meet E. O. McCormick, the passenger chief of the same company. Mr. Sproule did not stay in New York any length of time—just long enough to transact some business for the railroad corporation.

The new Sunday regime of the World is conceded to have "made good." It consists of Editor-in-chief F. L. H. Noble, formerly city editor of the Examiner and Bob Davis, formerly a reporter on the Call, now assistant to Mr. Noble. Both these men were with Hearst for many years.

The Summer Girl's Dilemma

The girl in the Haight street car wore a flaring flower hat, costly butterfly silk blouse and white flanneled skirt, and she looked too dainty and summery for anything. The weather was warm and the car was not very full so she presently opened the package of confectionery she carried and began to daintily nibble at creamy chocolates. She kept her attention on the street signs however, and as block after block flew by she became a bit anxious. She tried to catch the attention of the conductor but she only aroused the interest of a willieboy at the other end of the car. By and by she hurried to the door, chocolate bag in hand. As she put the chocolates on the seat beside the door the willieboy noted how snugly the dainty white dress fitted the trim figure.

"Have we passed Central Park yet?" she murmured sweetly to the conductor.

"Nope."

"Are we near it?"

"Do you want to get off at Central?"

"No; I want to get off at Ashbury to visit my sister, but I always like to know a litle ahead of time when I'm near there."

"All right, miss, I'll put you off at Ashbury."

"Thank you," and she sat down on the seat next the door. Presently she felt beside her and then glanced down the car to the seat she had recently occupied. Then she began to move uneasily and an alarmed look crept over her sweet face. Gradually her lips puckered and her face began to grow pale.

Suddenly the conductor clanged on the bell and as the car stopped he shouted, "Ashbury"

She never moved but she puckered her lips more resolutely and something like tears began to gather in her eyes.

"Ashbury!" repeated the conductor in louder tones, eyeing her intently.

Everybody looked at her but she stared straight ahead, apparently oblivious of everything but the view.

Bing-bang! went the bell, the car shot ahead, the conductor shrugged his shoulders and began to count up his cash. One by one the passengers dropped off the cars. The willieboy gave her a fond, lingering look as he passed her and alighted at Cole street. A few moments later the car slid on to the turn-table at the Park entrance.

"All out," shouted the conductor.

"Don't we go into the stables, or—or some such place?" she gasped in trepidation.

"Nope; this is the terminal; all out.'

"But—but, I can't," she gasped.

"Can't! Why?"

"Why—why, I don't want to."

"Pay another fare, then."

She seemed about to give way to the flood of tears, but she held them back while she asked, falteringly, "Is—isn't there some place I can go in to?"

"What's the matter—sick?"

This brutal question started the tears. "I am perfectly well," she said with dignity, "but—but I am sitting on my chocolates and I've ruined my dress and I must go somewhere to fix it, or—I'll have to ride up and down till it gets dark enough to go to my sister's." —The Gripman.

The failure of Mrs. Bessie Stewart's society millinery shop reminds one of something in "The Spenders." Mrs. Gwilt Athilstran, daughter of an American cooper and mother-in-law of an English duke, is discoursing on society taking to trade: "Lots of 'em takin' to trade nowadays; it's a smart sayin' there now that all the peers are marryin' actresses and all the peeresses goin' into business. Only trouble is it's such rotten hard work collectin' bills from their intimate friends; they simply won't pay."

Automobile Topics

The numerical strength of the party of automobilists which sailed for Ireland last week to witness the international cup race is regarded as strong evidence that the recent casualties of the Paris-Madrid race have had little influence upon the sport. It was expected that, as a result of the unfortunate accident, automobile racing would suffer in popularity, but as the first shock wore off and the true conditions of the contest became known the general interest increased. There is scarcely any likelihood of a repetition of the French accidents in the Irish affair, as the precaution will be taken to start the contestants a sufficient distance apart to make a neck-and-neck race impossible, or almost so. New York automobilists, while rooting for the members of the American team, would have been much better satisfied were that city better represnted in its make-up. All of the American machines in the race were made in Cleveland, and two of them will be driven by Cleveland men, while New York is represented by two men, one of whom will ride in the race as a representative of the German Auto Club and with a German-made machine.

Those automobile owners in this country who complain of strict laws for regulation of their speed on the public highways should study some of the measures that have been proposed across the seas. The recklesness of chauffeurs there has produced a popular exasperation which evolves some very stringent remedies. In Normandy local authorities have rigged up fire engines, standing with power ready, along the roads most infected with racing machines, and when a too-rapid machine passes it is to be brought to terms with a cold douche. In Conservative England James Wier, M. P., proposed that local constables shall be trained in the use of the lasso, to rope in motormen who transgress the speed limit. Sir Ralph Payne Galway has devised a more drastic remedy. It is that authorities shall furnish country-side dwellers with snipe-shot cartridges, and that the swift automobilers shall be subject to an open season for shooting. The special size of snipe shot, it is pertinently pointed out, will be serviceable for identification of the offenders when they apply for medical assistance in the next town to have the shot picked out. It presents a feature of automobiling under difficulties when the racers may encounter a stream from fire hose at one point, run the risk of being lassoed out of their seats in another and being peppered with small shot farther down the road. But the fantastic character of these measures should impress on the automobile lovers the importance to them of having full regulations for safety carefully obeyed. The automobile kept within the limits of safety is a salutary relaxation, with great possibilities of development into practical fields. The vital importance of establishing and maintaining those limits is as great to the automobile interest as to the public at large.

Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. is said to be fonder of automobiling than of any other sport. He prefers to ride in his white ghost or red devil to any of the other jolly pleasures open to a young millionaire. New York is a great city for automobilists. They have right of way most anywhere. Bronx Park was for a time closed to the chauffeurs, but there is now a boulevard expressly for their use.

It was rumored this week that Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., had paid fifteen thousand dollars for the machine with which M. Louis Renault arrived first at Bordeaux in the Paris-Madrid race. I learn that the machine is actually in possession of Mr. W. T. Dannat, who made the purchase immediately after the race. —The Automobilist.

The Climbers

If Mr. Clyde Fitch would ply his pen more leisurely, and not be on the alert to dramatize the latest scandal and exploit the newest fad he would soon achieve a reputation for playsmithing worth having. He first gave us a glimpse of his talent in "Beau Brummel," he sustained the promise of that drama in "Lover's Lane" and he has vindicated his craftsmanship in "The Climbers." There is none of the slap-dash, pot-boiler mediocrity which characterized "The Stubbornness of Geraldine" in this latest Columbia offering. There is sufficient thrill in "The Climbers" to satisfy the most exacting playgoer. Indeed it abounds in thrills, and it has the finesse of Pinero in many of its realistic scenes. Pinero mirrored the degeneracy of London's smart set in "The Gay Lord Quex,' and Fitch reflects a phase of the vulgarity of America's pretentious plutocracy in "The Climbers." The play is a smashing satire on the foibles and vanities of the newly rich, and it exposes the hypocrisy and sham of the socially ambitious. The flippant Mrs. Hunter is not an exaggerated type of the ostentatious matron whose sole purpose in life is to achieve social conquests. The hypocrisy of the people of her set is accentuated by Fitch but it is not overdrawn. All the characters of the play are drawn with such unerring distinctness that it is not difficult to recognize them as people one has met on the world's stage. Amelia Bingham presents the play with a company that is quite capable of following the pace set by the star. But the star is not a glittering planet of the first magnitude. Amelia Bingham is merely a capable actress, sufficiently gifted to portray the emotions of the ordinary woman without impressing anybody with the quality of her genius. She is versed in all the little tricks of repression, and she knows how to attune her voice to the various notes of emotion, but she lacks the individuality that marks the great mummer. However her performance is conscientious and in the role of Mrs. Sterling she arouses deep sympathy for the faithful wife and noble mother. Mr. Wilton Lackaye in the role of the daring speculator, the husband who is shy of a sense of honor, and who disgraces his family by misappropriating the funds of his friends, is as usual artistic and intensely dramatic. He makes the character of Richard Sterling a most repellant one, and in no way appeals to the sympathy of his audience. I am told that Mr. Worthing, who created the role in New York, posed as a victim of circumstances and glossed the character of the moral wreck, but I think that Lackaye's conception is the more effective one. Sterling was a rascal from boyhood, according to the testimony of his friend; he was a petty larceny thief at college. Fitch painted him without a redeeming color and Lackaye is loyal to the text. Miss Adelyn Wesley is a capital Mrs. Hunter. She is a most picturesque snob and makes her points with true dramatic precision. Miss Bijou Fernandez is all that could be desired as the snappy Miss Godesby. This young woman played a smaller part in the original production but she has the talent and the temperament essential for the more important role. Of the men in the cast Mr. Ernest Lawford is perhaps the best suited to the role assigned to him. His "silly oss" performance ranks next to that of Lawrence D'Orsay who is now a New York star.

"Fedora" at the California

Four acts of tense, excited interest were only broken at the California on Monday night by the necessity for curtains between them. The house was packed clear to the top seat of the gallery, and the interest was so sincere that not a woman groped for a hat-pin or reached for a wrap until Fedora had been brought to life to respond to a final curtain call. "Fedora" seems overdrawn to those who feed their appetites on modern comedy-drama. But this early Sardou work has the stuff in it that holds the attention. From the first to the last you hang upon the words and incidents. Nance O'Neil finds a strong vehicle for her genius of emotion in the last two acts. So gently does she lead up to the tragedy of the last two scenes, her acting seems almost tame. But the contrast between the woman of the early scenes and the Fedora who, heartbroken, ends her life by taking poison, is thus made more powerful. On Monday night a woman sitting near me remarked to her escort, "Much as I admire Miss O'Neil, she never thrills me. She never carries me out of myself." I looked at the speaker when the play was over; she was wiping the tears from her eyes. That was a genuine tribute to Nance O'Neil's portrayal of the character. Loris in this play is a part that goes side by side with that of Fedora. Indeed, some of the strongest lines fall to Ipanoff. Ratcliffe did it full justice in both its light and emotional sides. Where he weakens his impression on an audience is in his facial expression, which he has not under complete command, but his elocution is most commendable in this day of slipshod diction. Millward developed unexpected comedy talent as Jean and Blanche Stoddard, formerly of the Grand Opera House stock, made an acceptable Countess Olga. Herbert Carr was a dignified Gretch, and Clifford Dempsey, late of the Alcazar company, fitted well into the part of Roudel.

Romantic Drama at the Alcazar

What is a male star to do when he is given a huge bouquet of roses, and the leading lady doesn't get a single blossom? If he passes it over to her, his friends in the box who threw the posy may take offense: if he retains them, there's the leading lady to reckon with, not to speak of the audience's favor or disfavor. White Whittlesey solved the problem on Monday night by keeping his bouquet. Perhaps he gave it to Miss Creighton behind the scenes, later on; only the call-boy or the dresser can tell that. The theatre was jammed on the first presentation of "Monbars." The play was worthy of its audience, and Whittlesey well deserved all the applause and curtain-calls he received. "Monbars" goes even beyond "Heartsease" in point of perfection of production and presentation. The cast could not be improved upon. Miss Creighton looked beautiful as Diane, and acted her role with discretion and grace. I have never seen Juliet Crosby look more charming than as Madame Mouton. She made such a distractingly lovely picture in that big poke bonnet that one continually found attention wandering from her lines to her fascinating headgear. Miss Crosby has a role that suits her in Blanche Mouton, and she acts with brilliant spirit. Henry Shumer is making a success lately in the villain parts, and that of Laurent gives him splendid scope for strong acting. Bacon as Mouton also has a role that suits him. Whittlesey in the title role is a picture to warm the matinee girl's heart. He is so tall he dwarfs all the others on the stage, and his costumes are superb. He made a speech on Monday night, in which he referred to his "Heartsease" reception, of which the "Monbars" one was almost a duplicate in enthusiasm.

At the Grand

"In Central Park," like its predecessor, is a gay spectacle peppered with good things a la vaudeville. It is a prettier show than the preceding musical eccentricity, has far richer costuming for the shapely, snappy, fresh and lively chorus. The grand march with the striking figure of Cheridah Simpson at the head makes a handsome stage picture that has to be repeated several times nightly. The daintiest and most artistic of the many good things contributed by the specialists to this pot pourri of fun is the song, "You Have Such Beautiful Dreams," rendered by Budd Ross and Anna Wilks. Cheridah Simpson and the chorus sing very happily a drinking song composed by our own Shafter Howard that wins a gratifying share of applause. It is light and graceful in movement with the true opera bouffe spirit. Raymond and Caverly uncork a lot of new gags, parodies and funny business in the German pattern of the Rodgers Brothers. They go, as is evidenced by the number of recalls they get, especially on their new "Reuben" song. Those who like a melange of stage things are sure to find something to their fancy in "In Central Park."

Stevens at His Prettiest

As Baron Henri de Grim in "Madelaine" Edwin Stevens does some exceptionally brilliant character work. It is a role that affords better opportunities for the display of his versatile talents than are to be found in the average comic opera. It also enables Mr. Stevens to look his prettiest, and with the artistic aid of a make-up the comedian has charms to agitate the breast of the most exacting matinee girl. "Madelaine" is a very charming little comic opera of the romantic order, the music of which is in Julian Edwards's best vein. Arthur Cunningham has a rollicking song in the first act, and Annie Myers, in the role of Matrimonial Mary, sings the story of her matrimonial experiences in a way that wins several encores. Bertha Davis is an effective Madelaine and Ferris Hartman a comical Gourmet.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"The Climbers" will run for but one week longer at the Columbia, and will be followed by Haddon Chambers's play, "A Modern Magdalen."

At the California the week will be devoted to Nance O'Neil's repertory, beginning Monday night with "Magda." In this McKee Rankin and L. R. Stockwell will reappear in their old parts of Col. Schwartze and Gen. Von Klebs. On Tuesday night "Queen Elizabeth" will be given; Wednesday night the Ibsen play, "Hedda Gabler"; Thursday night either "La Tosca" or "Fedora"; Friday and Saturday nights, 'The Jewess"; Saturday matinee a farewell performance of "Magda" and on Sunday night "Oliver Twist," with Nance O'Neil as Nancy Sykes, and McKee Rankin in his world-famous character of Bill Sykes.

"In Central Park" will continue to pack the Grand Opera House. It is too good to be missed and every one will wish to see it.

"Wang" will be revived at the Tivoli with Stevens as the Regent and Hartman as Pepat. The next opera will be a decided novelty, the fine work by Smith and De Koven entitled "The Highwayman," which had a triumphal run in the East, and in which Camille D'Arville scored heavily. Edwin Stevens will have the part of the detective, Foxy Quiller.

"Brother Officers" will be given with a strong cast at the Alcazar—Whittlesey, Wyngate, Adele Belgarde, Bertha Creighton, Marie Howe and Oza Waldrop in the leading roles. Fred J. Butler will make his first appearance with the company in the part of Hutton, the dissembling race-track sharp.

"Twirly Whirly" has splendid drawing powers and will go another week at Fischer's. When the public tires of it two travesties will take its place—"Under the Red Globe" and "The Three Musketeers."

'Kidnapped," in which James Corrigan will appear at the Central, is a strong melodrama with striking scenic effects and some comedy touches. Among the features are a startling "leap for life and love" from Brooklyn Bridge and the burning of the wine-cellar, in which the hero is imprisoned and unconscious. Jennie Weidmann joins the company, and Genevieve Kane will make her first appearance with the Central stock as the wronged wife in "Kidnapped." The theatre's new season will open Monday, July twentieth, with Herchel Mayall in "Faust."

Mabel McKinley, the favorite niece of the late President McKinley, ought to be a great drawing card at the Orpheum. She is a soprano, whose voice was trained by the famous La Cource of Paris and by Isidor Luckstone of New York. The latter's brother is Miss McKinley's accompanist on her tour. Charles Dickson, one of America's best comedians, makes his vaudeville debut here in "A Pressing Matter." William and Kitty Harbeck, hoop rollers from Australia, Mosher, Houghton and Masher, expert and comedy bicyclists, Young and De Voie, clever acrobatic dancers, from New York, will also be novelties to us.

At the Chutes will appear the Lutz brothers, the "twentieth century marvels." Clarence Lutz, who is armless, is a remarkable musician and sharpshooter. Evans and St. John, "the effervescent pair," Fred Wadell, the "king of clubs" and the Waldron brothers in a novel turn will all help to enliven the bill. Kartelli and Robinson and Grant will vary their stunts.

Leahy's Intended Surprise

Manager Leahy of the Tivoli contemplated a very pleasant surprise for the patrons of the popular opera house a short time ago. It was the engagement of Camille D'Arville as prima donna of the Tivoli company. Negotiations were in progress for several days, and it was almost settled that the singer should appear in this week's production. Just as she was about to affix her signature to a contract a difference arose, and no further negotiations were held. When Camille D'Arville married Mr. Crellin, a wealthy citizen of Oakland, a few years ago, it was announced that she intended to retire from the stage. Later on it was announced that she had retired, but she has been singing in vaudeville entertainments with but brief intermissions ever since. It is evident that she is as firmly wedded to her profession as she was before her marriage to Mr. Crellin.

Personalities on the New York Stage

Those who think Barney Bernard goes a little too far when he reaches out after people in the audience with his gags ought to visit New York when a show is on. The company not only flings quips over the footlights, but at those behind them. When "Twirly Whirly" was wafted upon Broadway at the first Thursday matinee Willie Collier and Lillian Russell were discussing their ideals. Said Collier: "Mine is a tall blonde—some nights. She looks very much like you, in fact enough like you to be an advertisement for those cigars you make."

"I, too, have an ideal," said the queen of comic opera.

"What do they look like?" asked Collier.

Marshal Wilder, in a front row, began laughing until Collier begged him to stop and let the show go on.

When Willie suggested to Lillian that they tell their real names, she said that two years ago she was known as little Nellie Jackson.

"Two years ago!" exclaimed Collier; "my, how you have spread out." When Miss Russell, who is really Nellie Leonard, called him Willie, he hushed her up for fear Louise (Mrs. Collier) might be listening in the wings. In the second act Willie had an inning with Fay Templeton. When she asked him if he had an opening for her, he said:

"Yes, the first door on the left, but I don't think you can get through. It was made for Bonnie Maginn."

Pete Dailey sprang joshes on Frankie Bailey all through the season. One was a statue pose in which, with shaded eyes, he gazed into the distance. He dubbed the pose "Looking for Frankie Bailey's Voice." In one scene, where the leading lady wears a crown solidly set with diamonds, Pete remarked:

"Too bad you have a headache."

"But I haven't," returned Lillian.

"Then what are you doing with all that cracked ice on your head?"

Lillian Russell is never disconcerted at any gag flung at her impromptu. It will be recalled that one of "Twirly Whirly's" lines refers to a great financier—"Russell Sage, for instance"—so that the repartee was, "Russell's age? I never discuss a lady's age in her presence." One day Lillian changed this at a matinee to "J. P. Morgan, for instance," and Dailey lost on his straight tip. Very few of the original New York gags can be used in the San Francisco productions of the Weber & Field burlesques, chiefly because they lack savor so far away from home. Jokes on Lillian Russell, for example, do not fit Maude Amber, who hasn't a feature in common with the fair Lillian. But in New York they don't object in the least to personalities.

New Stage Epigrams

These epigrams are from Hobart Chatfield-Taylor's play, "The Idle Born":

A husband is like an umbrella—when you lose him always suspect a friend.

The only consolation plain women have is being virtuous.

One has only acquaintances and enemies in society.

Don't bother about your husband until you are so old other men won't bother about you.

It is getting more difficult every day for a well-bred woman to keep her position in New York.

The Fourth of July Idea

Bob Edeson was talking the other evening about the American dramatist—and the opportunities which the dramatists let slip. "Ask an American playwright to build a drama for you," he said, "and what does he do? Straightway gives you the roll of drums and the sound of muskets. He picks out the three war periods in our life—the Revolution, the Rebellion, the war with Spain. So far he seems to think there's nothing in our national life worth the exploiting except the glory of our marksmanship —when that is really the least of our Americanism. Now, there's our consular service, for instance. We never posed before the world as diplomatists, and yet American diplomacy is keen enough, subtle enough to cope against the rest of the world. Take the inherent grit that is part of the national character, and that wakes a man up to the exigencies of the situation. There was that chap Bowen, hidden down in South America—why, a year ago not a soul of us knew who he was or where he was stationed. The opportunity came—the man was there to meet it in the true American spirit—the straight-from-the-shoulder fashion. Our consular service is full of such chaps, and any number of plays could be built about them. There's no need of hauling in the American flag, you know—wrapping a fellow about with it and playing for cheap patriotism. The poor old flag has stood for so much, don't let us play trying for the gallery on account of its red, white and blue. But one can get the spirit of Americanism without hauling in the national colors to do it. Augustus Thomas wanted to write an American flag at the the finale of the third act of 'Soldiers of Fortune' but I wouldn't stand for it. Other things stand for the national spirit—one needn't yell 'Three cheers for the red, white and blue' to prove that he's an American."

The Orpheum has as its kingpin entertainer this week Julian Rose, a Hebrew character comedian with a bright monologue full of amusing stories. Rose is a monologuist far above the average of his kind. Henrietta Byron with her new clothes, Barney Fagan and a new sketch, received an ovation on her reappearance. The Wang Doodle Four are clever colored singers and dancers, and Vernon the ventriloquist is out of the ordinary.

Before Denman Thompson produced "The Old Homestead" he made a pot of money out of "Joshua Whitcomb," which is built on much the same lines. He might have hung on to it forever, and gone on making money indefinitely. But it is good for James Corrigan that he didn't. Corrigan plays old Joshua with all the genuine, homely touches that make the character so entertaining. He has succeeded in drawing big audiences to the Central all the week, and two days more than were originally intended. But the illness of comedian Curtis necessitated the withdrawal of "The Greenhorn" after a few presentations and "Joshua Whitcomb" took its place. Corrigan does not depend wholly upon himself to make the rural drama go. There are numerous good specialties. Eugenie Thais Lawton gives a melodious whistling solo which is as good as any of Alice J. Shaw's warblings. Myrtle Vane, the Columbia quartet and others also contribute to the entertainment. Corrigan will be at the Central for two more weeks, playing in "Kidnapped" and "Muldoon's Picnic.". A splendid array of attractions has been arranged by the management for the new stock season, which will shortly open.

There is to be an eruption of "Alexander the Great" plays next season. Hackett is to have one. Richard Mansfield intends to star in one, and James and Warde have one written for them by Collin Kemper and Rupert Hughes. —The Playgoer.

Views on the Glorious Fourth

Firecrackers were invented by the Chinese who have also given us bubonic plague, polygamy and highbinder wars.

If more people knew the Declaration of Independence there would be less racket on Fourth of July.

On Independence Day the young and thoughtless love their country so strenuously as to make the more sensible and sensitive hate it.

Our forefathers, in signing the Declaration, forgot to make any provision for fire underwriters.

There used to be a time when a contemplative patriot could go out into the country during July and thus save his eardrums. Today they are shooting firecrackers among the daisies and skyrockets from the redwoods.

The meaning and true significance of the Fourth will never be entirely overlooked by the American people so long as there are political aspirants willing to explain these things from the platform with a view to future nomination.

To the average small boy patriotism is a thing that can be bought for a small sum of money from a dealer in fireworks.

If all the money expended in fireworks were judiciously used in a lump there would be enough to build as large an idiot asylum as the case requires.

On April Fool's Day the fool gets revenge on his neighbors; on Independence Day he gets revenge on himself.

If love of noise is an attribute of savagery, how much lower than the Hottentots must we be!

All this shooting may not mean war but it certainly proves just as dangerous.

The most violent explosions of the day are caused by grown folks who try to excuse their folly by saying that they are doing it to amuse the children.

"DOMESTIC" LEADS.

Hope Cheney, the young daughter of the John Vance Cheneys, whom the despatches say aims at grand opera, was a very bright little girl. When the Cheneys lived here, Hope was the pet of those who visited their home. She was called the "mascot" of the Abbey Cheney Amateurs, the club formed of her mother's pupils.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

Origin of Famous Hymns

The origin of many of the popular hymns that are sung with zest wherever Christian people assemble deepens the interest in both the songs and the singers. "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me," was written in 1775 by Rev. Augustus Toplady, a learned English divine, who died at the early age of 38. In his last illness he said: "I cannot tell the comforts I feel in my soul; they are past expression. It will not be long before God takes me, for no mortal man can live after the glories which God has manifested to my soul." The marble tablet over his grave says: "He wrote 'Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me.'" Mrs. Vanalstyne, better known as Fanny Crosby, the blind poet, wrote the hymn "Safe in the Arms of Jesus" for music, in twenty minutes. Miss Crosby, after a day's jostling through the city streets, guided by some loving hand, returned to her little room and poured forth her soul in song. Of the many hymns written by Sarah Flower Adams, the only one that has survived is the hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," based on the Bible story of Jacob's vision at Bethel. One day Charles Wesley was sitting by an open window, looking over the beautiful fields, when he saw a little bird pursued by a hawk. The poor thing, weak and frightened, in seeking to escape from its enemy, flew into the room and found refuge in Wesley's bosom. As the poet was then in great trouble and needed the safety of a refuge, the incident seemed to him a divine message, and, thus inspired, he wrote "Jesus Lover of My Soul."

Former San Franciscans

Mrs. Walter Reed has been singing a good deal lately. She is the best known and beloved of Portland's contraltos and has made her home in the Oregon metropolis for many years. But she is a San Franciscan born, and as Rose Coursen was a favorite singer here. She is a sister of Madame Ellen Coursen-Roeckel. Their brother Edgar Coursen is one of Portland's prominent church choir directors and organists. In April of this year Massenet's oratorio, "Mary Magdalen," was sung at the First Congregational church in Portland under Edgar Coursen's direction, Mrs. Reed singing the contralto role. There are few musical affairs given in Portland in which she does not take a leading part.

The Toreador Song

In the Woman's Home Companion this month is told the story of how the original score of the toreador song was changed. When Bizet submitted his song to his librettist, Halevy said it was too good, so good that it would never be popular.

"You ought to put more snap and swing in it," he said.

"Great heavens!" returned Bizet, "do you want me to write for the slums?"

However, he took Halevy's advice, revised his music and made it the popular success it has forever continued.

Ferdinand Gottschalk, of Amelia Bingham's company, is the composer of some dainty morceaux. When he was a member of Rosina Vokes's company he wrote a charming minuet, which the fair Rosina danced in one of her sketches.

Emil Paur has made an artistic and social success in Madrid, where recently during a performance of "Tannhauser" he was bidden to the royal box and congratulated warmly.

Mrs. Alvina Heuer Willson, who has been visiting her mother at 2117 Taylor street, was recently called to Boise, Idaho, by the serious illness of her husband. —The Music Critic.

Satire and Poetry

A. M. Robertson has issued "Flim-Flam Society Girl," by Lionel Josephare and Beatrice Van Slope. The Van Slope share of the authorship is, of course, mythical, and the whole is a biting satire upon society, authorship, criticism, and various other matters. The imaginary Miss Van Slope, while undergoing a fashionable course of rest cure, is permitted to while away the time by authorship, that occupation, according to her physician's idea, not requiring the exertion of thinking. Beginning with light fiction, she progresses to poetry. Some specimens of Miss Van Slope's verse are given as interludes by Mr. Josephare, thus providing a medium for the expression of his own decided views on various subjects. Mr. Josephare's work has the ring of sincerity, and it is evident that he always writes from strong conviction. The present book shows a distinct advance in workmanship. His style is becoming clarified, and while there are yet some crudities of diction, they are less numerous than formerly. Mr. Josephare's command of language is unusual, and he owes it to his muse not to employ such words and turns of expression as belittle her, especially when he could so easily find more appropriate ones. On page 10 he says: "'Oh, let me read the newspape,' she entreated." This might be a misprint, but more likely it is device to save the meter; if so, a most unworthy one. Again, "They did not pain and yet somehow they riled her"; "But it took not the cake, nor captured the cruller"; "List, lovers of song, here appeareth the pome." Instances like the foregoing might be multiplied. They are not slang; there is no objection to slang in the right place, skilfully used it may contribute to strength; the trivialities I have quoted are, on the contrary, elements of weakness. One of the incidents of the poem relates the offer of a prize by "Sunstroke," California's leading magazine, for a poem celebrating the glory of California. Miss Van Slope competes, and, after some unsuccessful efforts, bears off the guerdon. This is the prize poem, a neat bit of satire:

CALIFORNIA HYMN TO THE SUN.

"O! westbound sun, I importune
As you descend Sierra's tops,
Shine on my grape and light my prune,
Illuminate my growing crops.

"Scowl on the streams of wicked East,
But smile on Sacramento trout;
And when your working hours are ceased,
Set by the Southern Pacific Route.

"O! sunset, dear to every breast,
Thou'rt like our fields of well-known poppies,
Making our setting sun the best,
And Eastern sunsets only copies.

"O! climate—maker of our zone,
The greatest name at my behest
I give you; henceforth be you known
As Native Son of the Golden West."

There is a basis of earnestness and thought to Mr. Josephare's booklet notwithstanding its unsubstantial title, and it will be found, upon the whole, well worth serious consideration.

Zack's Latest

The volume entitled "The Roman Road" contains three stories by "Zack," otherwise Miss Gwendolen Keats. Two out of the three are almost long enough to be termed novelettes. The first, which gives title to the volume, gives an account of an English manor house and the dwellers therein, and the curiously distorted morality of the lady who presides over it. She is most punctilious about the minutia of life, and exacts tithes of mint and cummin, but the one great wrong that she has committed, and which nullifies all her little particularities, affects her not at all. The situation is somewhat the same as that of Lady Transome in "Felix Holt." Both sons are living, and between the real heir and the one in possession there is little to choose, from the standpoint of those at their mercy. The second story, "The Balance," is less clear and direct than what one usually expects from this author, but the third, "Thoughty," ought to be spoken of in the same breath with Grahame's stories of childhood. One pities in advance the children who are brought up on modern tales, where giants are not, nor smugglers, nor pirates, nor highwaymen, and where there is a scientific explanation at hand for every phenomenon. No doubt "Thoughty" was a hard brother to live with, and "Doozle," the only girl, with three of his kind to contend against, did not find life all spring flowers and lollipop, but the "Doozles" who have never had her experiences have missed some of the good things in life. No doubt it will prove horrifying to the mammas of the little Lord Fauntleroys, and to those good ladies of both sexes who are bent on eliminating 'Mother Goose" and emasculating "Jack the Giant Killer," but to flesh and blood people the effect will be more like that produced on Jimmy's father, in Stephen Crane's "Whilomville Stories," when he came to interview his son in the quietude of his own room, in connection with some of the youngster's capers, and overheard the conspiracy of the bold bandits carried on in the garden beneath the open window. Any one who knows boys would put more faith in "Thoughty" and "Gimlet" and their ultimate security from turning pirates, smugglers and murderers than he would in any of the whey-faced little prigs who never carried out imaginary ventures. It is a pity that "Zack" did not give us another tale of "Thoughty" instead of "The Balance." The parts of that which relate to "Kink Pain's Henchmen" are far better than the love story. But one is not inclined to quarrel with "Zack," whose latest book is from Charles Scribner's Sons. —The Bookworm

Public Ownership of Water Works

The people of this city will surely decide in the near future the question of the advisability of owning their own water system. Aside from the importance of eliminating the water question from politics, it is essential that San Francisco should have an abundance of pure water. The Spring Valley Company has long since ceased to provide the city with pure water, and its sources of supply have not been augmented in proportion to the city's growth. We have been threatened with a water famine more than once, and there have been many times when a great conflagration would have tested the storage system of Spring Valley beyond its capacity. These are facts that have been brought to light during investigations before the Board of Supervisors, and it is a disgrace to San Francisco that such should be the condition of affairs. It is especially disgraceful in view of the fact that the city is within comparatively easy reach of the largest natural water supply in the world. The snows of the Sierras afford an inexhaustible supply of pure water, and sooner or later they must be tapped by a pipe line to this city. It is folly to rely on the uncertain sources of Spring Valley, which are quite frequently reenforced with the flow from cow pastures and other equally impure water sheds. A city whose population is increasing as rapidly as that of San Francisco must make provision for its water supply of the future, and it should not depend on a corporation which will always be managed in the interests of its stockholders rather than those of its patrons. Public ownership of an adequate water works is, therefore, a consummation devoutly to be wished, and sentiment in favor of it is crystallizing so rapidly that it cannot be long deferred. It is now being agitated with considerable fervor, and the people are being enlightened as to the advantages and necessity of public ownership and of a better supply, but it is absurd for those who are intent upon making it a political issue to affect an indifference to the interests of Spring Valley. That corporation must be reckoned with before we undertake to secure a public water works. It has certain interests and rights that cannot be ignored. The courts would never permit the city of San Francisco to render the property of the Spring Valley Company valueless. The city must purchase the system of that corporation before it can plan for a new one. And no doubt it will have to pay a great deal more than the system is worth, for the company has a shrewd way of giving verisimilitude to its preposterous claims.

Corporation Generosity

Apropos the purchase of the opposition lighting plants by the corporation that had long enjoyed a monopoly of the lighting business in this city, it was suggested by the Chronicle that it would be wise for the people in control to discourage new opposition by refraining from cinching the consumers. In other words the monopolists were advised to deal fairly with the people to the end that there should be no dissatisfaction and therefore no encouragement to capitalists to establish new plants with a view of being bought off. This was very good advice but nobody imagined for a moment that it would be followed. It has long been the custom of monopolists on this edge of the continent to charge all the traffic will bear. It has been demonstrated that this is not a wise policy, for competition is inevitable in all branches of industry, and when it comes the indignant victims of monopolistic greed are quick to show their resentment. The victims of the gas monopoly showed theirs when competition was started a few years ago, and it is evident that the directors of the old company heeded the lesson, for though they are privileged to charge the maximum rate of one dollar and thirty cents for gas they have given notice that the rate will be one dollar. It was proved, when gas rates were under investigation before the Supervisors some time ago, that dollar gas was profitable to the manufacturers, but nobody thought that the company would be content to sell gas at that price. The generosity of the company in voluntarily cutting down its own revenue after a most expensive fight against competition is almost incredible. Perhaps it is an experiment in fair dealing that may prove successful and lead other monopolists to follow the good example.

The Fanatical Fillingham

The Rev. R. C. Fillingham of England, an anti-ritualistic fanatic, who recently visited New York, was astonished to find that some of the Episcopal churches of that city were addicted to ritualistic practices, and he wrote a very insulting letter to Bishop Potter charging him with neglect of duty. Bishop Potter retorted discourteously, and the Englishman announced that he would return to New York in February and start a crusade against ritualism. He said he would not give his plans away but he intimated that he would start a big row in those churches in which ritualistic practices were indulged. "Ritualism is like a big pile of fuel, all ready to be a bonfire," he said, "all it needs is the torch. I shall apply the torch in February." His remarks have been construed as a threat to promote "rough house" in church. If such be the intention of the fanatical clergyman he will find, should he undertake to carry out his plans, that the police of New York have no sympathy with cranks. In England it is not improper for a person to arise in church and protest if he finds that the laws are being violated by ritualistic practices, for over there the citizens pay the expenses of the Established Church. But in this country the clergymen and the congregation decide what sort of a service they shall have, and if a person should attempt to create a scene and a disturbance by way of expression of his disapproval he would be guilty of disorderly conduct. If Fillingham doesn't watch out the police will get him, but perhaps notoriety is what he is looking for, and to achieve it he would be willing to spend a few hours in jail.

Horseplay and Weddings

The Pullman Car Company has a suit pending which, if successful, is apt to put an end to the monkey tricks which have been the accompaniment of recent fashionable weddings. Some of the sportive gilded youths whose sole idea of wit is horseplay and coarse practical jokes took possession of a car secured for the bridal party and proceeded to "decorate" it according to their taste, nailing up horseshoes, old slippers, placards, white bows and everything else they could think of, both inside and out, without regard to the damage to property, much less to the feelings of their victims. The result was that the car had to be sent to the repair shop, and the groom was made defendant in a suit for damages for two hundred dollars, not a great amount, to be sure, and probably no more than will compensate the corporation for the mischief, but quite enough to bring home to the perpetrators some idea of responsibility. If the victim of this sport is one of the gilded set he will probably not mind putting up an occasional hundred or so for the sake of advertising his class, but if he happens to be in merely moderate circumstances he is likely to revise his list of acquaintances and cut off such costly luxuries. The extent to which horseplay and burlesque have entered into the celebration of recent weddings in the smart set makes sober people pause to wonder whether they have even a passing realization that marriage means anything more than a day of sport and license. No one expects a marriage to be as solemn as a funeral, but, on the other hand, it should not be entered into lightly, with no sense of the solemnity of the ceremony. It should not be a vulgar spectacle, nor should it be the occasion for such demeanor on public ferry-boats and railroad trains as would call for the intervention of the police if the participants were not enthroned upon their millions. Neither is there any reason why public or private property should be defaced and damaged because to those who commit the depredations the amount of the injury is a mere bagatelle.

Why Be Good

An Eastern paper pertinently inquires why, in these days of sugar candy and rosewater methods, any one should take the trouble to be good. Why, indeed, when all the efforts of philanthropists are devoted to smoothing the path of the transgressor and shielding him from the consequences of his wrongdoing? The youth who starts life as a truant, and becomes in other ways a lawbreaker, may have just as good (or bad), a home and surroundings as his next-door neighbor, who does his best to be an exemplary youth. Who cares for that? He goes to school in some poorly-lighted, ill-ventilated and overcrowded building, and it is quite a matter of course, while the truant is removed to better quarters, and things are made as pleasant as possible for him, as an inducement to keep on in the path of learning. Later on the good boy, having finished such schooling as he is to get, must hustle for a living. He wants to learn a trade, but where, how, when? Perhaps he has whittled out gim-cracks at school, under the high-sounding title of manual training, but he has not learned the elements of a trade, and the prohibitions of the labor unions stand in the way of his apprenticeship, so that, without influential friends, or some one to take a special interest in him, he must pick up a livelihood as best he can, at some unskilled employment. Not so the erstwhile truant, who, being wiser in his generation, takes to petty crime and is sent to some reform institution, where he is taught a trade in the intervals of more schooling, athletic exercise, and good food and shelter, at the expense of the community. When he is released, at the age of twenty-one, he is bettter fitted, both mentally and manually, to cope with the world than the one who has not been a burden to the tax-payer. The good boy is glad to be able to pay rent for a few rooms in a crowded tenement, and make his small wage go as far as he can in supplying cheap food, but the other chap will probably paddle in the shallows of criminal life, and when times are hard be committed to a comfortably warm jail, in which he will be served with food of a better quality than most industrious workmen enjoy, supplied with library books free, and carefully kept from over-exerting himself. When he is liberated there will be "Helping Hands," "Prison Gate Associations," Salvation Armies and benevolent individuals, all falling over themselves in their anxiety to help him to find work. The man who keeps clear of the clutches of the law may starve and freeze, and unless he is considerate enough to do so in public, and so discommode traffic, no one is going out of the way to inquire how he fares. Doctors, lawyers, preachers and criminologists unite to find excuses for the lawbreaker. There is always some reason why he cannot help himself. He has "an unfortunate heredity," or they discover that he has prominent ears, blue eyes, straight hair, or some other characteristic which denotes his exemption from responsibility, so the way of the transgressor is made easy. It is worth while to consider that since the passing of the woodshed and the spank strap, juvenile depravity has increased, and the unrestrained youth makes the criminal adult. Children no longer have an expectation, much less a fear of being called to account for their misdeeds. To be the bad boy of a neighborhood is to achieve importance, and to be sent to a State institution is a distinction. Our penal management is in reality a coddling of criminals, and it offers a premium for the unfittest. The industrious and well behaved are elbowed aside in favor of the scamps, and the man of thirty who has held to respectability by teeth and toe nails, in spite of the hardships and poverty of his condition, may well look back and ask: Why be good?

The Doctrine of Damnation

At the Brooklyn Presbytery, the other day, objection was made to a candidate for ordination on the ground that his views as to future damnation were indefinite. The objection was a serious one and therefore it should have occasioned considerable surprise, but clergymen are not always blessed with a lively sense of humor. And yet the objection raised in the Brooklyn Presbytery, coming as it did so shortly after the adoption by the Presbyterian General Assembly at Los Angeles, of the revision of the Westminster Confession, should have struck even the gravest and most sober-minded of the gentlemen present as a capital joke. The very purpose of that revision was to impart an air of indefiniteness to the doctrine of future retribution. It was the theory of the revisers that though the old Confession laid stress on the terrors and uncompromising sternness of the justice of God, yet it offset them with a sufficiently consoling declaration of the Divine love and mercy. The Brooklyn candidate said that he was unable to reach a positive opinion as to the duration of future punishment, and he was willing to leave the question open. "I think," he said, "there is enough to preach of sin and salvation, without going into speculations." The young man was accepted by a vote that would have been unanimous were it not for the single member who expressed dissatisfaction with the candidate's loose views of hell. The objections were promptly overruled, for of course the dissatisfied member is not an up-to-date theologian. It is no longer fashionable for Presbyterian clergymen to discuss the doctrine of everlasting punishment in the lake of fire. It was once the favorite theme of the Westminster Confession School, but now it is seldom touched on, for people have grown very sensitive, and they take their religion like their pills, sugar-coated.

The Craze for Commemorating

It is well known that Hall Caine prides himself on a fancied resemblance to Shakespeare, so that when, at one of the periodical indignation meetings to protest against desecrating the town of Stratford, some one took occasion to forecast the time when there will be a bust of the Manx novelist placed opposite to that of Shakespeare, with the invitation to "look upon that picture, then on this," it was too much for even Marie Corelli's gravity. Truth to tell, these indignationists are doing more to cheapen Shakespeare than are all the wicked American tourists, and since we have adopted the custom of memorializing, "shrining," "pilgrimaging" and centennializing cheap authors, dime novelists and village poets, there is no special honor in being set apart for a celebrity. Of course it is only the fad of an hour. A certain coterie have a penchant for making themselves conspicuous, and one author is as good as another for that purpose. In ten years' time some other fancy will engage them, and museums of relics and memorials will be alike forgotten. A large proportion of the expensive projects will never be carried through unless by private subscription, and the wonder is that, seeing how many such schemes have met with the same disastrous end, there are any rash enough to project more. It is precisely the fate that overtakes our projected holidays. Time and again it has been attempted to make Lincoln's birthday, Grant's birthday and other birthdays take rank with that of Washington. Flag Day, Maine Day, Dewey Day and a host of other days have been proposed since the last year, but a single observance is about all they have had. Memorial Day, intended as a solemn occasion, is observed as an excuse for picnics and sporting events, and Bunker Hill Day, Forefathers' Day, and a comfortable sprinkling of other occasions are forgotten by all but the few who hold to their provincial customs wherever they find themselves, and at the end of any decade in which at least one new holiday has been proposed each year, we are apt to find ourselves just where we began, with Christmas, Fourth of July and Thanksgiving the only occasions universally celebrated. Shakespeare will not cut a larger figure in the literary world at the end of the twentieth century for all the clubs, memorials and birthdays that have been kept. Neither will the Scots revere Burns the more because of cheap excursions, nor will Carlyle's essays and histories gain anything because of the pilgrimages to Cheyne Row or the photographs of his back yard. The stars keep on in their courses in spite of all the terrestrial telescopes leveled at them, and the occasions worth remembering, whether they be Shakespeare's birthday or "the year of the big wind," will hold their places in spite of, rather than because of the puny efforts of a few would-be celebrities to gain a little reflected notoriety.

New Panacea for Divorce

And now comes the Rankin University with its own patented panacea for divorce. Among the doses offered are: "Women should learn to know their husbands"; "let wives and sweethearts study psychology and thus become able to read the minds and dispositions of their husbands to be." Isn't there a chance that the woman who has made herself thoroughly acquainted with her prospective husband's psychology may change her mind regarding marriage with him? A man's character usually has the good and the bad balanced in such fine proportions, and when a woman sets herself deliberately to study them—well, she needs far more than a collegiate education in psychology to arrive at a capital decision. Nature has a quicker and easier, and, on the whole, a better way of solving this great conundrum. Though the divorce records may show she sometimes errs, yet her system has survived through countless generations, notwithstanding the thousands of substitutes that have been offered to replace it. The way of a man with a maid puzzled wise old Solomon, and the univerities will find more profit in tackling the qualities of radium than in trying to settle the problem that has stumped the human race.

Love and Death

BY HARRY COWELL

In his "Thirty Years of Paris" Daudet tells us how Flaubert, Turgenev, Zola, Concourt and himself, a friendly five brought together by a common love of letters, considering themselves, forsooth, "unsuccessful authors," were wont to dine together once a month, the dinners lasting from 7 p. m. to 2 a. m.; and how, when they had done with discussing each other's books and the topics of the day, the conversation became more general and they fell to talking familiarly of the time-worn, but ever timely, themes of love and death.

How I wish I had been there, hiding behind the usual accommodating arras, a not altogether impolite eavesdropper, listening to those unrecorded conversations. What a spectacle to witness, even with the ears alone—those giants tossing freely back and forth the weightiest and most wonderful of words, love and death crossing each other, as in life, at all sorts of angles, or fatefully meeting!

Whether, like Job, we die full of days, a burden of memories upon our backs, the fire of life fallen into gray ashes; or, like Juliet, forward looking, full of dreams and desires, the fire beautifully ablaze; those two words, love and death, strangely coupled as we ever find them, are without doubt the most mysterious and moving in our vocabulary.

Of all the flowers that blossom in this garden of God, love is the fairest, the most fragrant, and the most subject to death. Furthermore, for it there is no day of resurrection: when love dies, it is dead. And yet love defeats death: the torch of life flames in the hands of lovers, and they pass it on. The individual lovers perish, but love and the race of man endure.

Were love (I here mean not the wilding but the cultivated form)—were love as hardy as the weed hate, would it not be less dear, less desirable? Does not the idea of death make kissing more sweet? Is not quite half the charm of youth, of love, of beauty, due to their evanescent nature? Did the dusk of evening not die so soon into the night, would it be after all so well beloved of lovers? Flowers are fair because they fade. We have a passion for the poppy; we are indifferent to the immortelle.

Life owes infinite things to death, as does love—a subtly sweet flavor, a fineness of feeling, an eagerness, an intensity; all because the time is so short. Death and love are the life of art; death and art the life of love. The making of love is a fine art, which all men practice, wherein but few attain proficiency. Every amateur, bungling pitiably over the very rudiments, desires to be adored, and not even the masters deserve to be. No man was ever yet worthy of love.

To compare what and how much one thinks of love and of death at sixteen with what and how much one thinks of each at sixty, would, as the phrase is, be interesting and instructive.

At sixteen death is something that might happen almost at any time to any one—except to me; but love is then inevitable: it must happen to me.

Love! To the young it means one thing, to the old another; this to a man, that to a woman; the pessimist who has been disappointed in it, the optimist who is happily married, both use the same word to express how different ideas! Here a maiden tries to imagine what it may be; there a grandame, to remember what it has been!

Death! Think for a moment what diverse things the matchless word means to a Theosophist, to the orthodox Christian, to the Atheist, to the Spiritualist, to the Agnostic.

Death is the great misunderstood, the great unappreciated. It induces us to use the Now to its uttermost; it quickens the love of life, the life of love. Death forces upon us a refinement of choice. Whoever heeds his friendly reminders will not waste the wonderful days, knowing them to be numbered.

I do not say nice things of death to the end of finding favor at his inescapable hands. He is nearer and dearer to me than he is to most men; and I feel friendly toward him. The delightful curiosity one enjoys concerning him more than compensates for any little pain he may cause.

To depict death as a skeleton is to make selection of the obvious and the ugly; to be inartistic. A skeleton is a nasty nude. A domino and a mask would be more appropriate, would give proper play to the imagination, would be more in keeping with our ignorance, would not beg the great question. Death does go in disguise, and may be an angel.

And one of his offices may be to disengage a man from the many things wherewith he here confounds himself and is by others confounded, and to reveal him to himself and to others for what in very deed he is. And another—But all this is wild conjecture. What death is we know not; that he is we know; and of his relation to love we know this, that lovers ride post haste in his direction, consuming the numbered days in numberless kisses.

But whether we kiss or refrain from kissing, we are all the while journeying toward death; each setting of the sun sees us inevitably nearer to that great stopping place whither all footsteps tend—that "vasty inn," with its self-closing door making entrance so easy, exit so difficult.

Here's to mine host!

Is Wheeler Going to Retire?

When President Benjamin Ide Wheeler started on his Eastern trip, a short time ago, the report gained currency in Oakland that he had shaken the dust of Berkeley from his feet forever. The President of the University has many enemies across the bay, and they believe that he would like to retire gracefully from his position. They say that he has proved himself a failure; that he is lacking in executive ability, and that some of the Regents have begun to regard him as a very shifty fellow, and that therefore he does not enjoy their confidence. When it was reported in the despatches that there was some likelihood of his being appointed Minister to France it was at once suggested that he had not been cultivating the friendship of Roosevelt so assiduously merely in the interest of the University. Wheeler has undoubtedly made himself very unpopular in certain influential circles, and I have no doubt that he could be easily lured away from the University.

Benjamin Ide as a Diplomat

It would be very interesting if President Benjamin Ide Wheeler of the State University should really resign his post to be our Minister to some country or other. But he is unlikely to do so because he is poor, and diplomats have great difficulty in living on their earnings; there is such a large establishment to keep up and so much entertaining to do. Wheeler found it impossible, or said that he found it impossible, to keep up the fine stone house the Regents were building for him in Berkeley, though it was difficult to see just why this house should cost more to keep than the one he occupies now. Of course it would have cost more to furnish, but he could have struck Mrs. Hearst for the coin, and that is a rock which has never failed to gush money when he tapped it with his rod. Good university presidents are very hard to get and the Regents would have an awful time replacing Wheeler. They still remember what a time they had to replace President Kellogg, who was thoroughly unsatisfactory for years before they could find a suitable successor.

Why Kellogg Was Shelved

The thing that cooked Kellogg's goose more than anything else was the exhibition he made of himself going East. He went in a tourist car, was seen and recognized and promptly called down for such niggardliness, for he was getting a good salary. Shortly after that he gave a student entertainment at which he served coffee and cake by way of refreshments, and this in spite of the fact that he was allowed fifteen hundred a year for entertaining. The Regents heard of this and promptly cut off the entertainment fund, so the old man's parsimony proved disastrous. It did not matter specially, however, for Kellogg is a rich man. Before he left the university he became a real estate dealer. He bought a large tract of land adjoining the university grounds at a very moderate figure and then he sold it in parcels to professors. Of course when he offered a home site, no professor thought it was wise to refuse it, and so the lots sold readily at a large advance and now the Kellogg residence in Bushnell Place—I think they call it—is surrounded by choice professorial homes. In spite of this, the Regents settled a five-thousand-a-year pension on the ex-president when they retired him, and as he lives on about fifteen hundred he has a nice little margin to put in the bank.

What Has Become of Reinstein?

Many people interested in University affairs are wondering what has become of J. B. Reinstein in connection with Mrs. Hearst's affairs. Once he was her factotum —she could do nothing except through him. Now he is never seen with her. In the old days he dined with her constantly, accompanied her to The Hague, where the International Architectural Competition was opened and closed, and spent most of his time on the Hearst architectural scheme. But now he seems to be completely separated from her and everyone is wondering why. Perhaps Charley Wheeler has forced him into the background.

Stanford Offers an Attraction

The Berkeley university is not, by the way, to take the lead in attractions for 1903. Stanford has a big card up its sleeve, which will probably give the Palo Alto institution quite a boom. It is none other than the magnetic Pietro Mascagni, who is under engagement to give twenty concerts at Stanford University. He is guaranteed twenty thousand dollars for his series by Mrs. Stanford. Sunny Pietro is to give concerts in but three cities outside of California—Chicago, Milwaukee and Kansas City.

Anti-Pardee Growls

Governor Pardee's troubles have commenced. The Governor has been distributing his patronage, and, as he is possessed of no divine attributes, he has failed to retain the love and respect of those upon whom he inflicted serious disappointment. The loudest and most distinct sounds of teeth-gnashing come from the other side of the bay, where the bewhiskered doctor was engaged in practical politics of various shades before achieving his great ambition. When a budding statesman in Oakland throws out his hooks of steel to grapple time-serving friends for future emergencies he cannot afford to be fastidious. Pardee was a thoroughly practical politician. His thoroughness won him the nomination for Governor, and now he is expected to show his gratitude. But he finds that if he gave all his old friends among the peanut politicians of Oakland the jobs they want he would be guyed all over the State, for Oakland has a wonderful assortment of tax-eaters. But it is not only in Oakland that he has been roasted for his selections. One of his severest critics is Senator Ralston, whose hammer has been very active. Ralston has told him that some of his appointments were very bad. He instanced the appointment of J. A. Filcher to the St. Louis Fair Commission as one of the very bad selections. "I should think," he said to the Governor, "you could find a Republican for that position, but if you couldn't you surely didn't have to appoint a man who used to run an anti-railroad organ and ride on a pass."

They Never Die

There is said to be some uneasiness among the grave and venerable dames that direct the sprouting of thought among the future mothers and predestined club women of the Girls' High School. It is because there has been some agitation of the advisability of retiring them to private life. Some meddlesome person recently suggested the possibility of employment as a teacher in the Girls' High School being conducive to longevity, whereupon inquiry was made and it was learned that the pedagogues of that institution never die. And then arose the question whether a woman who has passed the three score year and ten mark is competent to perform the duties of a teacher in a high school. It appears that nearly all the teachers in the Girls' High School are over sixty, a few have passed seventy, and one is at least eighty. Yet it is admitted that they are all brilliant women, and that they were most successful teachers in their days. To them many of the most accomplished mothers and grandmothers of the city are indebted for their education, and there are pupils in the high school today who are being instructed by the same women that taught their grandmothers. It is not strange therefore that those women should be suspected of having outlived their usefulness, but if an attempt were made to remove them an awful hubbub would be raised, for their old pupils would rally to their defence and demand that they be retained. Those aged women have long since been regarded as permanent fixtures of the department, and what matters it that they have grown impatient and peevish with age, or that occasionally they wander off into day-dreams or retire to a couch to snooze while the class looks after itself? Sentiment is with them and it will demand that they be allowed to continue their labors undisturbed.

Miss Cynic—Then you'll spend most of your time in Whitechapel, I suppose.

A Bitter Contest Recalled

The suddenness of the marriage of Miss Viola Piercy and Mr. Burnett occasioned almost as much surprise as did the quiet manner in which the ceremony was performed. When people of wealth marry nowadays their friends expect them to have elaborate weddings, and to put themselves on exhibition, and they are grievously disappointed if the affair is not a public function. I presume that the privacy of the Piercy-Burnett marriage was in deference to the wishes of the bride's grandmother, Mrs. Dunphy, who is in feeble health, and who is a woman of strong prejudices. It seems but a few years ago, though nearly two decades have passed, since little Viola Piercy was the subject of one of the bitterest guardianship contests that ever took place in the Probate Court. It was waged by the relatives of her father on one side and those of her mother on the other, and the latter won. Her father, Samuel Piercy, was an actor who at the time of his death was just coming into prominence in his profession.

The Unconventional Anna

Dr. Anna G. Lyle, the distinguished California girl who has just returned for a vacation from her professorship in the University of Vienna, is educationally a product of this State. She is a graduate of Stanford University, where she took her degree in physiology and left a record as one of the most original, self-willed, independent girls that ever attended the Palo Alto institution. She always had lots of money to spend, and she used to startle the campus by entering the Quadrangle daily on horseback and wearing a stunningly becoming riding habit. Her unconventional charm was accentuated by the fact that she wore her profusion of reddish gold hair in a braid down her back. Even at that time her remarks were the clever observations of a woman of the world, and she was never sparing of them. She was independent on the subject of friendship as in all others, and if she saw a man whom she wished to speak to she did not wait for the formality of an introduction, but launched forth into conversation. She was for a time a disciple of Marie Bashkirtseff and she used to indulge her egotism by gazing at her reflection in her glass and striking the favorite attitude of the unhappy Pole. But this was a passing madness, and Anna Lyle was, in her own line, one of the most direct thinkers and brilliant scholars which our young universities have produced.

A Quaint Companionship

Few people outside of the congregation of the Swedenborgian church out in Lyon street are aware of the fact that it is one of the most artistic places of worship in the city. Some of the best things that William Keith, the painter, has done, are set as panels in the walls of this picturesque church. Mr. Worcester, the dilettante minister, is an old and tried friend of the artist. The two old men are, each in his way, equally original, and their companionship is suggestive of what Stevenson called "to make friends without capitulation." Every day the venerable minister makes a little pilgrimage to the studio of his artist friend and the two, beyond exchanging greetings, often say nothing, but sit wrapt in meditation. But if a day should pass without the two seeing each other both would take pains to find out the reason why.

A Social Mystery

I hear that society will see very little of Miss Sarah Collier next winter, it being her intention to devote nearly all her time to charitable work. It has long been a mystery as to how this stunning young woman has managed to elude Cupid's wiles, for she is said to have received more offers than any other young woman in society. She has always been the particular pet of Mrs. Salisbury, who invariably placed her in the first set of her Fortnightly Cotillions. Her fad is driving, and she can handle six with masterly skill.

Theatricals on Nob Hill

From reliable authority I learn that Mrs. M. H. de Young intends giving a series of amateur theatricals in the theatre of her California street residence, and that she will take occasion to exploit her own histrionic talents as well as those of some of her friends. "As You Like It" and "Twelfth Night" are her favorite plays, and society may look forward to seeing her in the hose and buskin of Rosalind or in the picturesque robes of Olivia. A debutante who heard of the proposed Shakespearean revivals has suggested the production of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" with Addison Mizner as Falstaff. A dramatic club is to be organized this fall with Ella Bender, Mrs. Mark Gerstle and Dr. Shiels as leading members.

The Stork's Busy Year

This has been a boom summer for the stork in society and the long-legged bird seems determined to make it a record season. The Jack Casserlys were delighted when the bird alighted on their roof. They now have two little ones. Last week the stork visited the George H. Popes and though this was his third visit, his welcome was none the less sincere. Mrs. Horace Pillsbury has gone to Boston to her mother's home. She expects the second arrival in August, and has frequently said that she has no use for San Francisco doctors.

Busy Life of Mrs. Will Tevis

One of the busiest matrons this season is Mrs. Will Tevis, whose energy would rouse the envy of a live business man. Besides keeping an eye on the Tevis place in San Mateo which it is expected will be completed soon after the Tevis's return from abroad this winter, she is managing some attractions on the ranch near Bakersfield, superintending the construction of a house-boat on Lake Tahoe, and paying numerous visits to different house-parties throughout the countryside. To fill up her spare moments she has under her consideration plans for a house which will be built, I am told, somewhere in Pacific avenue.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

Gabrielle Lived Here

It seems curious that the dailies, in publishing a despatch about Gabrielle Bompard's purposed lecture trip to the United States, failed to comment upon the fact that the pardoned murderess of Goffe formerly lived in San Francisco with Eyraud, her alleged Svengali. I do not recollect whether the arrest was made here, or if they escaped and were captured elsewhere. The Eyraud-Bompard case occurred years ago and was the first, I believe, in which hypnotism was set up by way of defense. Only a Gaboriau could do full justice to the story. Goffe was rich, and that made his murder worth while. Gabrielle enticed him to her apartments in Paris. She distracted his attention with her caresses while Eyraud—her Svengali, as she alleged later—strangled him from behind a convenient portiere. Then they robbed Goffe's corpse, packed his body in a trunk and sent it wandering while they came to America. In this city they posed as papa and daughter and had adjoining rooms in a private house where they lodged. Either because father was an invalid or daughter was timid there was a connecting door. When they were taken back to France Mademoiselle Bompard claimed to be under hypnotic influence and hence not responsible for her part in the murder. Eyraud was executed. She put in a plea of impending motherhood and her execution was stayed. Whether the child ever materialized, the despatches have never told us. La Bompard is to lecture in this country on hypnotism.

If dowdiness were next to godliness what a lot of our society women would be assured of a heavenly hereafter!

Madame Bavarde Going East

Ned Greenway may czar it alone this winter, if a distressing rumor now going the rounds be true, and the Bulletin may be without its Bavarde. The on dit is that Mrs. Monroe Salisbury is going to join Mr. Salisbury in New York late in the fall, and that she will remain there all winter.

Leo XIII.

Blessed with a lively sense of humor, Pope Leo often went strolling in the Vatican gardens just as the dailies were polishing off his obituary notice, and people were incredulous when the report that he had been fatally stricken was flashed over the wires in the early part of this week. But so ripe an age had he attained that when the news of his illness in all its details had been received people of all shades of religious belief, who esteemed him for his many grand qualities of heart and mind, felt a thrill of sorrow, and the hope was universal that the end of his brilliant career had not been reached. There is no corner of the civilized world today in which the great Pontiff is not beloved for the beneficent influence which he has exercised. The gentlest and yet the manliest of men, it would be difficult to recall in the world's history a single individual, other than the one whose church he ruled, who did more toward conquering the material and sensual world by the light of his intellect and the splendor of his example. Leo XIII has been writing across the century in letters of light that can never fade, the most magnificent and authoritative code of ethics the world has ever known. In those marvelour encyclicals, so exquisitely graceful, are to be found almost every subject of national, social, domestic and individual ethics treated in the most exhaustive, conclusive, luminous and simple manner. And so eagerly have they been sought that as soon as they left his pen they were translated and read in every language of the earth. He has been the teacher of every grade and condition of society. What a sublime and inspiring picture he has presented, fading away, in the years that have been wonderfully lengthened, into the light of eternity, always striving for the good of his fellow man, never resting, though his frail life threatened at every moment to flutter away into the world beyond!

The World's Benefactor

Leo XIII was born in the dim past, when Napoleon was deluging the nations with blood. He came from a sandaled and togaed people, his childhood was spent in an ancestral palace, and he was one in whose veins ran the blood of the famous Coladi Rienzi, the last of the Tribunes, and yet for years he labored obscurely and faithfully in God's vineyard, and never did he seek the ring of the Fisherman. It was this man whose words have controlled the clamors of the laboring masses, whose appeals are at present inspiring the fight in the few Catholic countries that are left for the last rampart of Christian civilization—Christian marriage. And it was the voice of this marvelous personality that checked the tyranny of the rulers of certain nations and made justice and mercy prevail. Great therefore is the debt of mankind to that High Priest of God from whose glorious life the world has profited for its peace, its happiness and its truth.

Electing a New Pope

When the news of the Pope's illness was received there was naturally a great deal of interest among the men of the Sacred College, for it appeared that the day was approaching when the Grand Papal Chamberlain, taking a little mallet in his hand, would tap on the head of the dead Pope and, after calling him by name three times, as Cardinal Pecci did his predecessor, would announce that the reign was over. This ceremony, quaint and significant, and emblematic of the vanity of all human affairs, is followed by the summoning of the conclave and the selection of a new ruler of the Church. But meanwhile there is the novendial, or nine days succeeding the Pope's death, during which takes place the celebration of his obsequies. So soon as the last ceremonies for the dead Pope have been performed in St. Peter's all is ready for the conclave of Cardinals held for the election of a new Pontiff. To preserve an appearance of secrecy, the quarters occupied by the cardinals are isolated from the rest of the building and from the outer world by the walling up of every door and window. Each cardinal has a separate room which he draws by lot and may not exchange. On the first day of the conclave mass is celebrated in St. Peter's and at night the cardinals disperse to their cells, after which the cardinal camerlingo, accompanied by men with torches, inspects the whole vast quarters, peering into each dark corner to see that no unauthorized person is hidden there. On the morrow the balloting begins in either the Pauline or Sistine chapel. It is rare that more than two ballots a day are taken until some candidate receives more than the requisite two-thirds vote. At the largest recorded conclave, that of 1878, sixty-one cardinals were present; the conclave of 1800, held in Venice, had only thirty-five. That of 1800 lasted one hundred and four days; that of 1878 only three days.

The Coronation

It appears to be the general impression that the Pope must be a cardinal. The canon law does not prescribe that he must be even a cleric. Nevertheless since the election of Urban VI in 1378 the successful candidates have belonged to the Sacred College, although as late as 1758 a non-cardinal was voted for several times. The coronation of a Pope occurs a few days after the election. He is borne to St. Gregory's chapel, where he is attired in the pontifical robes of state. As he comes out, a master of ceremonies stops him, and, kneeling, holds before him a silver wand tipped with tow, which a cleric lights. As the tow burns, the master of ceremonies sings, "Sancte Pater, sic transit gloria mundi." After a second burning of tow, which symbolizes the evanescence of even papal pomp, the Pope proceeds to the high altar to receive the pallium. Mass is celebrated during which the general clergy do homage; that concluded, the Pope is borne to the balcony which overlooks the square of St. Peter's, and there, in the presence of thousands of spectators, the mitre having been taken off, the triple crown is placed on his head by the second cardinal deacon. "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns"—thus runs the ancient formula—"and know thou art the father of princes and kings, the rector of the globe, the vicar on earth of our Savior Jesus Christ, to whom is honor and glory, world without end." The Pope then gives his benediction, "urbi et orbi," the multitude applauds and the pageant ends.

The Conviction of Saunders

Civil Service Commissioner McCarthy and his trusty henchmen of the Building Trades' Council exerted all the influence at their command to save Business Agent Saunders, a brother-in-law of the McCarthys, from conviction on a charge of embezzlement. "Cleve" Dam, the legal adviser and handy factotum of the unsavory McCarthy, exerted what little legal ability he has in behalf of the thief, and brother-in-law McCarthy swore for him with his usual glibness, but the culprit was found guilty. Saunders has been McCarthy's confidential man for years, and he could tell a most interesting story about the inner workings of the bosses of the Building Trades' Council. Dam, the legal adviser, was formerly a resident of Oakland where he has quite a record. Every little while Billy Foote has him haled into court on an order of examination with a view of locating a little money that Dam gave him the "rush" for on a certain memorable occasion. Foote has never been able to recover the money.

A Monument for Bret Harte

Robert Aitken is to have the honor of making the bronze monument to be erected here of the late Francis Bret Harte. A subscription is now under way for the monument. Bas relief portraits of Harte will be sold to swell the fund, and several Bohemian Club artists will paint portraits to the same end. The last resting-place of Bret Harte is in Frimley churchyard, Surrey, and his tomb bears the inscription: "Bret Harte. Aug. 25, 1837—May 5, 1902. Death shall reap the braver harvest." The stone was erected by Madame Van der Veld, "in faithful remembrance," and fir trees are planted about it. Last Christmas English and Americans visited the grave and laid wreaths and flowers upon it.

Why Boris Was Embarrassed

When Grand Duke Boris was on this coast about a year ago I published a paragraph to the effect that he had said, after having danced with Mrs. Sterling Postley at Del Monte, that she was the most beautiful woman he had met in America. In a short time the story was quoted by numerous papers, and ever since then Mrs. Sterling Postley has been referred to as the woman whom Duke Boris declared to be the most beautiful woman in America. Now the Duke is once more in America, and he stated to an occasional correspondent of mine in New York the other day that the story had embarrassed him very much, because he had pronounced Miss May Goelet the most beautiful woman he had ever met in any country. Unfortunately I cannot vouch at this time for the story which I published a year ago, as the gentleman who quoted the Duke to me for publication is now in Europe. The Duke's embarrassment is probably due to the fact that the Goelets have lionized him, and that he is now visiting them, with the prospect, it is believed, of winning the hand of the young heiress. It is said that he has the sanction of the royal house of Russia to choose an American wife.

The I. W. Hellmans are domiciled at their beautiful place on Lake Tahoe. It is one of the handsomest homes in the Tallac region, and is said to have cost a matter of two hundred thousand dollars.

Says the Cup Is Safe

According to a private letter from a well known local yachting man who has been closely watching the interesting trial spins of both the Reliance and the Shamrock III the race of August twentieth will be the closest, sharpest and liveliest in the history of the America's cup. He pronounces Shamrock III a beautiful boat under sail and clearly faster than Shamrock I, but it is hard to get a clear line on her real capabilities because Captain Wringe, who handles her, unquestionably does not work her for all she is worth in the trial spins. It is as easy "to pull" a yacht as a horse, you know, and Wringe is undoubtedly jockeying with a view to springing surprises on us during the race, but that is to be expected. It's exactly what every new challenger has tried to do. Up to date, though, they haven't succeeded in springing any successful surprises on the shrewd Yankees who are defending the cup. However I'll have to admit that the Shamrock III is a very beautiful boat under sail, among the ideals of racing 90-footers. She is clearly and easily faster than Shamrock I. She moves fast in smooth water, makes a small bow wave and leaves as clean a wake as the Reliance.

Her Strongest Point

"She points well, goes about quickly and has good natural stability. Her sails set superbly. She should be very close to the Reliance in a shinnaker run in a light breeze, but the American boat will probably do the better in windward work. In a strong breeze she will undoubtedly prove very fast on all points of sailing. Her poorest work any time will be on a reach, a line of work where the Reliance is unusually strong. I look for her best performance in moderate weather and beating to windward. A seven knot breeze will show her at her best. Under such conditions, though, I do not think she is up to the mark of the defender. In light breezes and smooth water she seems to show the remarkable qualities of the Reliance. In my opinion the race will be close but I think the cup is safe. The Europeans think differently. So highly do they rate their chance of success with Shamrock III that an unusually big crowd of them is coming over next month with the keen expectation of seeing her lift the cup. President Roosevelt is going to be present on one of the government boats. Altogether it will be the most swagger and the liveliest international race in history."

Nothing But Caged Employes

As I foretold last week, Professor Mabilleau, the eminent French sociologist who recieved such scant treatment when invited to lecture at the University of California two months ago, has come out with some blunt and biting criticisms on the ways of American professors and the methods of our universities, both state and endowed. It is only fair to state that he visited other universities besides our own before he delivered himself of the following: "If a professor is to do the highest grade of work and accomplish a maximum amount of good, he must be at liberty to think and speak as he pleases, even though his thoughts and opinions may be contrary to those of trustees and founders. In America, unfortunately, this is not the case. Educators there are bound to respect certain interests, and failure in this respect on their part often results in enforced resignation. Numerous instances of this sad state of affairs have arisen in the past few years, and I have personal knowledge of several such cases. Professors in American universities are like caged employes. They may not speak, they may scarcely even think, as they please. They must respect the opinions and interests of the trustees who employ them and of the rich men who make the institution possible."

Weak Spot of Universities

This blunt statement has drawn forth a shower of replies from all over the country. Crystallized, they seem to be that perhaps Professor Mabilleau's account of the situation in the United States is a little overdrawn. Perhaps, too, the state university as conducted in America might not carry the assurance of perfect freedom of thought and utterance which it is said to do in France; for partisan politics has at times, in such state universities as we have, crept in with muzzle or club to control university teachings or make faculty politics. But in a general way Monsieur Mabilleau has touched a great weakness, a great evil of our system of higher education through privately endowed institutions. There is no sort of question that the source of the endowment and the opinions, prejudices and interests of the donors, actual or possible, have a regulative and repressive influence upon the utterances of instructors in the departments of economics and sociology, and a more or less controlling power over the management of the institution. What Monsieur Mabilleau tells us to our face is largely true and as humiliating as it is true. The growth of expenses, the increase of salaries, the magnitude of the endowments, all tend to make educators pensioners of the money power. The Chicago University and Palo Alto have recently given signs of this influence. Will they be able to withstand it in the future?

Makes His Own Fireworks

The launch party given by Dr. Harry Tevis on the Fourth of July is said by those invited to have been "lots of fun." Claude Terry Hamilton entertained the party at dinner at the Hutch in Sausalito. It was served in the arbor and the garden was illuminated with over five hundred Japanese lanterns and innumerable fairy lamps. The day and night fireworks were designed and made by Dr. Tevis himself, who has a passion, it is said for "playing with fire."

Something New In Weddings

The pretty wedding of Miss Lucy A. Furbish and Mr. H. C. Campbell, which took place on June thirtieth, was somewhat of an innovation, but one that appeals to home-loving people. It was solemnized in the charming flat at 1325 Masonic avenue which is to be the future home of the bride and bridegroom, and thus their married life was begun under their own roof-tree. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Vorsburg of Oakland, a friend of the bride, and the guests were only close connections of both families. At the bridal table, at the supper following the ceremony, were Mr. Walter C. Campbell, the groom's brother, Mrs. Marriner-Campbell, Dr. and Mrs. Pratt, Miss Bessie Pratt, Mrs. E. P. Buckingham, M. B. Ivory, Miss Fannie Edgerton and Miss Elizabeth Freeze. Walter Campbell was toastmaster.

Made a Happy Bridal Show

Accounts of the marriage of Miss Bessie Swift, daughter of the Chicago millionaire, and Charles Fernald of Santa Barbara, that have wafted this way indicate it was a most gorgeous affair. Mr. Fernald went to Chicago some time before the wedding, which occurred on the twenty-third of June, and his fiancee took pleasure in displaying her Californian betrothed to the admiring public. The two were the most conspicuous people at the American Derby held in the Windy City. Wherever Miss Swift and her promised husband went the bridal party to-be followed after and the little procession had a copyright on the lorgnettes of the curious. The girls who were to be Miss Swift's bridesmaids were gowned, if not alike at least in the same color effect, and it was only the touch of black on Miss Swift's white gown that prevented people from thinking that it was a bridal party turned loose at the race. As the Fernalds are to spend much of their time after marriage in Santa Barbara the San Francisco colony who have flitted there are much interested in them. The Robinson Rileys who have bought a home down there are great friends of the groom and will be among those who will enjoy the lavish hospitality the Fernalds will be able to indulge in with the Swift millions to grease the wheels of the merry-go-round.

The Seeley Dinner

The news that Mrs. Herbert Barnum Seeley has instituted divorce proceedings against her husband has revived recollections of the Seeley dinner which was the talk of the country seven years ago. It was given by Herbert B. Seeley, the defendant in the divorce suit, at Sherry's in honor of his brother Clinton Barnum Seeley, who was to be married ten days later. It became a celebrated affair because of the raid which Police Captain Chapman made on the banquet. He had heard that the vaudeville entertainment provided was going to be an improper exhibition. Chapman testified that "Little Egypt" danced with nothing but stockings on, and it was admitted that one of the dancers had some innocently worded signs on her, but denied that they were attached in such a way as to be suggestive. Chapman was afterwards tried at police headquarters for his raid.

The Eloquent Sullivan

Frank J. Sullivan scored such a hit by his eloquence on the Fourth that people are beginning to wonder why a man of his ability should have remained so long in the background. But the fact is that Mr. Sullivan has been a man of affairs for many years. Being a man of considerable wealth and culture he has always had a fondness for travel, and he has spent much of his time abroad in study and observation. Some years ago he took an active interest in the non-partisan movement in this city, and to him is due a large share of the credit for the purification of the municipal government. His was the guiding hand that directed the political fortunes of James D. Phelan in the early years of the latter's public career. If Mr. Phelan had been more willing to hearken to the advice of Sullivan in later years he would not, perhaps, have had to retire to private life.

Gavin Throws Out Signals

Gavin McNab, the canny Scot who became Mr. Phelan's political grave-digger, has been throwing out signals of distress in the last few days. Such strength has the anti-McNab movement gathered in all sections of the city that Gavin is no longer blind to the handwriting on the wall. The other day he sought a conference with certain Republican leaders, and suggested that a combination be made for mutual protection at the primaries. This was his first confession of weakness. The Republican leaders declined to consider the proposition, but they were not slow to put the story of the request in circulation. I hear that Mr. Phelan no longer places confidence in McNab, and that he has ceased to do politics with his old manager. The young millionaire was a long time discovering the char-

Spreckels and the Merger

Since the merger of the local lighting companies Claus Spreckels has been criticised for selling out and becoming one of the principal representatives of the monopoly. Some people appear to have been laboring under the delusion that the aged sugar magnate was masquerading as a philanthropist, and that he went into the gas and electric business solely for the purpose of relieving the downtrodden victims of monopoly from oppression. The fact is that Mr. Claus Spreckels engaged in the lighting business to administer a rebuke to the company that was being mismanaged by a boor named Crockett. That is an old story which has been told so often that it is familiar to everybody in San Francisco. Mr. Spreckels did not invest several millions of dollars in a gas and electric light plant for the sole purpose of supplying the people with cheap illumination. He was out for the long green from the day that the first pipe was laid, and people patronized his concern not because they admired him as a public benefactor but because he sold his wares a little cheaper than they could be purchased elsewhere. Mr. Spreckels made a gallant fight and forced the old company to pay him a handsome price for his business, at the same time getting in on the ground floor of the consolidated companies as one of the largest bondholders. All the old stockholders of the original gas company who sold out at a small figure when the fight was on are no doubt sore on Spreckels, and many of them are charging him with being a flim-flammer, but the old gentleman should not be held responsible for their misfortune. He merely consummated a profitable business deal, and as a consequence we are now buying dollar gas instead of gas at a dollar-thirty.

Mrs. C. T. Mills of Mills College has been visiting Byron Springs. C. C. Clay of Fruitvale was there last week, and recent arrivals at the springs are Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. Shainwald, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Klein, B. P. Flint, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Montgomery.

There will be an exhibition at the Camera Club this month of F. W. Guerin's genre work. Mr. Guerin was formerly of St. Louis. The third photographic salon of the Camera Club and San Francisco Art Association will be held at the Hopkins in October. The exhibition is to be such as will best exemplify artistic feeling and expression in photography, and only works of real worth will be admitted. The jury of selection includes Dr. Genthe, F. E. Monteverde, Newton J. Tharp, H. W. Seawell and John M. Gamble.

The published portraits of Princess Henry of Pless look so much like Mrs. Cornelia Baxter Tevis that her friends are calling her attention to the resemblance.

His Norman Blood

Apropos the introduction of an American cash register by Lady Deerhurst into a charity bazaar in England recently, Madame Bavarde remarked: "Viscountess Deerhurst, whose father was a member of an old Norman family in America, will one day became Countess of Coventry." Madame Bavarde dearly loves the nobility. The father of the Viscountess is none other than C. W. Bonynge, whose Norman blood counted for very little when he worked as a gardener for a San Mateo landholder, or later on when he performed the duties of a chambermaid in a local livery stable. He was not a gentleman in appearance and his manners were uncouth. A broker who patronized the stable where Bonynge worked gave him winning stock tips upon which he made considerable money. With this he went to Virginia City during the boom days, and as a curbstone broker augmented his bank account. He may be the scion of an old Norman family but the circumstance was not referred to in the old days. We are all members of old families, however, but we haven't all kept the family records.

Theodore Wores was in Tangiers at last accounts. He writes his friends that Africa is a great place and full of artistic material.

Costumes That Shocked

Alameda society has been shocked. During the recent hot spell residents of the Encinal city flocked to the cool waters of the bay that lave the town, and some of the fair sex sallied forth from their homes in costumes that are not considered de rigueur in the chaste little village. So neglige were some of the costumes that they sent cold chills through the conservative element that beheld the undress spectacle with feelings akin to horror. The suburbanites of Alameda are fearfully old-fashioned. They do not know that it is the custom in Atlantic City and other fashionable Eastern seaside resorts for the fair bathers to walk along the street from their hotel to the beach in bathing costume. Hence they were amazed to see women walking down to the waters of the bay hoseless and sandaled, and with a bare expanse of neck extending to a considerable depth, but shaded by a stylish parasol. One of those responsible for the shock of the town is a young matron, a member of the Criterion Club. Her daring exhibition of bare legs and neck excited much unfavorable comment among the sedate members of the club, and at a recent meeting the president of the organization took occasion to administer a rebuke. Of course it was very daintily veiled, for the president is a charming and tactful woman, but it inflicted a sting nevertheless, and she of the sandals retorted with much spirit. She asserted that envy had prompted the criticism of some of the club members who didn't dare expose their bones. Then she resigned.

An Oakland Engagement

The engagement of Miss Helen Richardson, a popular school teacher of Oakland, and Dr. Edward S. Grigsby of Nome, has awakened more than the usual interest on the other side of the bay. The young doctor is related to the Palmers of Oakland and through them to theWheatons. He went to Alaska to establish a hospital but the enterprise proved a failure. Dr. Grigsby was married once and that affair also proved a failure, but it was not altogether the doctor's fault. I believe it was due to his wife's jealousy, though there was really no occasion for it, for the doctor's conquests were largely fictitious. He is quite a hustler in social circles, and he has superb confidence in himself. Miss Richardson attended the University of California for a time, I believe, and made a record in mathematics, which she has since taught in the Alameda high school. She is an interesting girl with an infallible taste in dress. She visits the Charles Wheelers a great deal and is at present with them on the McCloud river.

From Pekin, But Not Loot

The August Chamots have returned to town after a long absence with a large collection of articles that bear a strong resemblance to Chinese loot. Mr. Chamot, it will be remembered, played a prominent part in the stormy days of the siege of Pekin. He was conducting a large hotel in the city when the Boxer troubles began, and nearly all the foreign legations took refuge in his establishment. The hotel was burned to the ground but Chamot rendered valuable assistance to the representatives of the foreign governments and their families. After the siege he recovered heavy damages for the loss of his property, and he was presented with decorations by several European sovereigns. The Chamots have a valuable collection of Chinese ornaments in jade and pearl and silk, but they deny having any loot. All that they have was presented to them. Among other things in the collection is a fantastic bonnet that belonged to the Empress. They have taken possession of the old Wilson house at Pine and Stockton streets, but at present they are rusticating with the Helmerichs at Inverness. Mrs. Chamot was formerly Miss McCarthy of this city, sister of ex-Supervisor McCarthy.

Mrs. Stanford's Denial

Mrs. Stanford is reported to have stated, in assuming the presidency of the Board of Trustees of the Palo Alto University, that she had delegated to the President the exclusive right to appoint and dismiss professors and teachers, free from all dictation, and that not in a single instance had his powers been curtailed. This statement places President David Starr Jordan in a rather awkward position. At the time of the summary dismissal of Professors Ross and Howard it was believed that Dr. Jordan acted in obedience to the wishes of Mrs. Stanford. It is true that he assumed all responsibility, but it was thought that his purpose was to shield the wealthy benefactress of the university, and that he was working under sealed orders. In her public denial of responsibility, however, Mrs. Stanford has simplified matters for herself while complicating them for Dr. Jordan.

Those Awful Intruders

The Upper Thirteen of San Rafael are thinking of holding a meeting to discuss ways and means of safeguarding themselves against the intrusion of objectionable characters. They have found that they are not so exclusive as they thought; that people without the proper brand have had no difficulty in hoodwinking them, and that they have no protection against contamination. Why, even Woods, who is now receiving so much newspaper notoriety, enjoyed social intimacy with three of the Upper Thirteen, and it has lately been discovered that they had been harboring a divorcee; not only that, she was a woman with quite a past, had lured away a friend's husband, and all that sort of thing. When she reached San Rafael with her husband he was an invalid and she was nursing him. As he was wealthy she had no difficulty in breaking into the swagger set. Presently the husband died, and within a month the sad widow appeared at an afternoon card party. Eyebrows went up and the Upper Thirteen immediately consulted the Ladies' Home Journal to see if the period of fashionable mourning had been shortened. Six months later the lady took unto herself a new husband and then she left town. The atmosphere of San Rafael had congealed. Now the villagers are busy fixing the blame.

Factions in Society

Two factions of Los Angeles society are arrayed against each other. On one side are the E. T. Earlites, and on the other are those that sympathize with the first wife of the millionaire founder of the Earl Fruit Company. Since their divorce the first Mrs. Earl calls herself Mrs. Emily Runyon Earl, and lives at one of the big fashionable hotels of the citrus belt city. It was rather awkward meeting her ex-husband at social affairs, but it was not until the millionaire married the sister of the wife of Dr. West Huges that the factional war began. Society was forced to take sides, and now it is said that a very hot campaign is being waged against Mrs. Earl No. 1. And by the way, some people in Los Angeles are still commenting on the fact that the Episcopal Bishop of the diocese sanctioned the second marriage of the millionaire.

Somewhat Premature

The Santa Cruz promoters of publicity sought to lure summer visitors this year to the somnolent seaside resort by announcing that numerous brass bands had been hired, and that the town was connected with Capitola by an electric road. The brass bands were on hand but the electric road has not yet reached Capitola. The electric road is a delusion and a snare. The people who go to Capitola don't miss it, because they have no desire to go to Santa Cruz, but those that go to Santa Cruz are indignant when they learn that they have been deceived. Capitola, by the way, has developed into one of the most popular summer resorts on the coast. Among last week's visitors were W. W. Foote and James V. Coleman, who went down to troll for salmon, and who were pleased to find that the fish were biting with avidity.

Anderson Has Recovered

A familiar figure at Capitola this summer is that of J. Francis Anderson, the eccentric Englishman of Ben Lomond, whose divorce suit excited considerable interest some months ago. It will be remembered that his wife died pending the suit, and that about the time that there was talk of a reconciliation. Anderson has evidently recovered from the shock for he has been having a gay time at the summer resort. He has been devoting a great deal of attention to Miss Ida Sargeant of the wealthy Sargeant family, after whom Sargeant Station was named.

Has a Boat Now

The overflow from Capitola and other points on the shores of Monterey bay was sufficient to crowd Santa Cruz over the Fourth. It was a very gay throng that spent the holiday on the beach and in the surf. But it was not the fashionable throng of the days of yore when the yacht fleet was anchored in the harbor, and the amateur tars were wont to contribute to the gayety of the occasion. A single yacht made its appearance this year. It was the Nixie with "Admiral" Fulton G. Berry of Fresno aboard. Berry has been known as the "Admiral" so many years that he recently decided to become a real mariner. He contracted malaria a short time ago and his friend "Commodore" Pew of Belvedere said to him, "Berry, you must buy a yacht; nothing better for malaria."

"Oh, I don't want a yacht," answered the Admiral, "what would I do with it in Fresno?"

"Never mind Fresno. Here's the Nixie for sale. Now you buy her, and you'll find her a great medicine."

And the raison grower bought the Nixie and sailed to Santa Cruz in her.

No Pony for Her

Admiral Berry was momentarily staggered by a bit of repartee on the Santa Cruz beach last Saturday. A daring feminine swimmer had attracted his attention and when she swam in from the raft she appeared fatigued.

"You need a little pony," suggested the Admiral.

"What?" she asked.

"Oh, I mean a little whisky would be good for you." The Admiral put it in this delicate way so as not to shock the fair swimmer.

"A little one?" she retorted. "What I want is a big one and I want it right away, see?"

At Del Monte

Among those who spent the Fourth at Del Monte were C. R. Splivalo and family, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Buckbee, Mr. and Mrs. Horace L. Hill and Horace Hill Jr., W. W. Carson, Miss Helen Wagner, W. Morgan O'Connor, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Armsby. Mrs. John A. Darling has come down from Rutherford and is visiting her daughter, Mrs. La Montagne, at the hotel. The Jack Parrotts are at Del Monte for the summer with their interesting brood. A guest toward whom not a little attention has been directed is Mrs. Arthur Bird, daughter of Salt Lake City's plutocratic banker, W. S. McCormick. Others at the hotel are Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Oyster, Major Lewis Smith, U. S. A., and his wife.

"Bobby" Eyre assures everybody that he is not going to marry yet awhile. "Bobby" has been in love so often that his heart is dotted with pinpricks—there have never been any severer wounds. The nearest to a real attachment that "Bobby" ever had was for that Amazonian young woman, Bessie Ames. Society still thinks this will be a match some day, "Bobby's" present crush on Miss King notwithstanding.

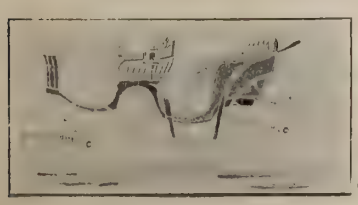
Ailene Ivers Robinson Perfectly Good Form

I overheard an interesting conversation the other day about Mrs. Ailene Ivers Robinson who has just returned from Europe to her Philadelphia home. Some one of her old intimates was inquiring if Mrs. Robinson had any children and the society woman to whom she was talking said, "Oh, yes, she is perfectly good form. She has one." They tell another good story of Mrs. Robinson which I have never seen in print. It seems that she is seven years older than her husband, who is very wealthy. Some one said, "Oh, what a pity that there should be seven years' difference between their ages and the difference the wrong way."

"Oh, no," said the kind friend—a great crony, by the way, of Mrs. Robinson in the old days, "you see, it was seven off for cash."

Women That Do

Probably of all the women's clubs in the city which lay claim to being "intellectual" the Spinners' Club presents the best case. There are very few of its members who do not do something and it is coming to include the best really serious literary workers on the coast. Not that its number of writers is so large, but nearly all of them have accomplished something in letters. Among this number are Geraldine Bonner, who made her reputation with "Hard Pan," one of the best novels of San Francisco color yet out; Margaret Cameron, whose short stories are appearing quite regularly of late in Harper's and whose book of amateur plays is soon to be brought out by McClure Phillips; Alice Prescott Smith, whose novel "The Legatee" is having a run; Mrs. Wallace Irwin, whose clever book of parlor plays will be brought out by Paul Elder this fall; Mrs. Al Gerberding, who is the author of "The Golden Chimney" and who has had a play produced by Ellen Terry in London; Grace Llewellyn Jones, who is responsible for a book on Italian life and travel; Mrs. Pennoyer, who has also brought out a successful work on Italy; Mary Bell and Ednah Robinson, who are both well known as magazine writers. By this list it is easy to see that for a club of its size, which also includes artists and musicians, the Spinners has more than its share of brains and can refute the popular belief that the West is no longer active in literature.



McEwen the Culprit

There is considerable discussion as to the genuineness of the "Englishman" who wrote that tirade against Americans called "The Preposterous Yankee," which is having such a run in New York, due to the American's love—I am afraid—of hearing himself cleverly cursed. All the ear-marks indicate that the book was written by an American who saw the commercial value of such a stunt and had the keenness to size up his audience. I have received a tip to the effect that the real author of the book is no other than that former San Franciscan Bohemian, Arthur McEwen. In his connection with the Journal staff he would be in the position to have his work sensationally exploited and commented on, just as it was in the Sunday edition. The book, too, is redolent of just that style which was noticeable in the letters which he had published in the Hearst editorial page and signed "A Gentleman." Altogether facts point to the conclusion that McEwen has played an exceedingly remunerative practical joke in assuming the role of a frantic Britisher who plies the lash upon the defenseless shoulders of the American people.

The West has been unusually active of late, judging from the current magazines. This month's Atlantic is a Californian number. Mabel Craft Deering, Will Irwin, Gelett Burgess, Ella Sterling Mighels and other local writers have contributed to its pages. And by the way I see that the publishers of Jack London's and Anna Strunsky's collaboration, "The Kempton-Wace Letters," are booming it as a literary conundrum, which they say will set the critics guessing. I am quite sure the letters will not cause any conjecturing among Californians, for I announced months ago that London and Miss Strunsky were engaged in the work.

The Eccentric London

Gelett Burgess is not the only one of California's strange geniuses whose table manners are on a par with his other social eccentricities. Jack London has performed some feats in this line which might make the editor of the Lark envious and teach him that there is something to do beside crowning oneself with lettuce leaves or upsetting the claret when making a bid for dinner-table popularity. It was several years ago when Jack London first came back from the Klondike. He was little known in the literary world, but he brought down from the North a fine stock of material, a youthful enthusiasm and a controversial leaning toward Socialism. He had not yet learned the value of a flannel shirt as an advertiser, so he wore starched linen like the rest of us when he was bidden out to dine by a conventional lady who believed in his genius and loved to hear his tales. London is a splendid talker when he is given leeway, and on this particular occasion he conversed well about every topic under the sun. Gradually the flow of ideas switched toward Darwin and a plain citizen took ocasion to dispute one of the young writer's points. "Oh, no, you are quite wrong," said London. "Any observer has doubtless noticed in the reproduction of the lower animals"—here, however, some tactful individual interposed another argument and the blushing situation was saved while the party retired to the drawing room.

The Epigrammatic Mrs. Mumford

It is a proverb in the New York literary set that there could not have been three more congenial cynics than those who wrote "The Cynic's Calendar." They are Addison Mizner, Oliver Hereford and Ethel Watts Mumford. Of the first two there is nothing new to be said, but the personality of the last is not generally known out here, aside from the fact that she has made her mark as a clever short story writer. Mrs. Mumford is a large, handsome woman with a wit and independence which remind me of Alice Rix. She doesn't care what she says so long as it is bright. The gentleman whose fate it is to pass as "Mrs. Mumford's husband" is also a writer by profession, and he pursues his Muse with more persistency, if less brilliancy, than does his wife. "Where is your husband?" asked a friend one day. "Don't know," was the careless reply, "the last time I saw him he was at a semicolon. I suppose that when he reaches the period he'll come home." Mrs. Mumford's new book of epigrammatic verse will be brought out by Paul Elder in the fall.

Frances Charles, whose new book "The Siege of Youth" has come out close on the heels of her former success, "The Country God Forgot," is at present living in San Francisco. Very few know that she is a Californian by birth. The scene of the new novel is laid in this State; the scene of the first was Arizona.

Aiken's Achievement

While on the subject of Western literary talent I should not overlook that which is exploited this month in the Sunset. Under the able editorship of Charles Sedgwick Aiken it has become one of the most creditable periodicals published in this country. Its July number is an achievement which ranks with the best of the most widely known Eastern publishing houses. It contains a very interesting article by Carl E. Ackerman on the subject of the President's trip to Yosemite, illustrated by some very artistic engravings. George Hamlin Fitch, the Chronicle's clever book reviewer and essayist, writes of Lake Tahoe, Miss Irene Connell contributes an interesting article on Glacier Point, and there are sketches and verse of exceptional merit by Herman Sheffauer, Bailey Millard, Porter Garnett, Gelett Burgess, Eloise Davis Everett, Mabel Porter Pitts, Helen Le Conte and other local writers.

In the current Critic appears a portrait of Pauline Bradford Mackie, well known in the Eastern literary world. She is in private life Mrs. Herbert M. Hopkins, her husband being the professor of Latin at the U. C.

A Pretty Love Story

Mrs. Percy Selby is entertaining her son Fred's wife and child at her Menlo Park home. Mrs. Fred Macondray came over from the Philippines recently and will spend some time in California. Mrs. Selby is a charming grandmother, and to look at her now no one would ever fancy she had been the heroine of a romance that once agitated society to its centre. The story of Elena Atherton Macondray's second marriage has been told many times, but never loses interest. She was fifteen when she married Fred Macondray, and he left her a widow with two children, a girl and a boy. When the daughter grew up, her neighbor, Percy Selby, fell in love with her. She, however, had her eyes turned in a different direction, and spurned young Selby's suit. Then Percy discovered it was not the daughter that he was in love with, but her mother, still beautiful and youthful looking. At first the young widow would not consider the proposition, such was the disparity in their age. But the young man's pleadings were finally effective and they were married. They have been happy ever since, too, just as they are in fairy tales.

The Cake Walk in Foreign Lands

It is amusing to note the various attitudes of the several European states over the American rag-time and cake-walk craze which has struck the continent and has introduced the coon step into places where the stately minuet thrilled the aristocratic revelers of old. The surprised admiration of the three great nations might be expressed something as follows:

FRANCE.

Ze tres comique Americain
He mek me laugh ha! ha!
He dance ze rag-a-time can can—
Que pensez-vous de cela?
Zat crazy dance has caught ze town,
Ze Marquise and canaille,
From mad atelier up and down
To historique Versailles.
No more zey sing "Ze Marseillaise"—
Voila ze kakwak tune
Which fill Parisian nights and days
Wiz "Coon, Coon, Coon!"

GERMANY.

Vorworts! I will der rag-time reel
Und down der ball-room skate—
Dot bughouse down-side-up gespiel,
Py golly it iss great!
Already I can do it yet,
Just fine and straight as chalk,
So hoch der Kaiser, und you bet
Ve'll hoch der caken-valk,
Und you can vager all you've got,
Ven I acquire der knack
I'll make dot old "Blue Danube" rot
Go vay down und sit back.

ENGLAND.

Upon me honah, don't y' know,
A jolly silly game!—
But in the Yankee lingo, though,
"It' gets there just the same."
His Royal Majesty, King Ned—
God bless the dear old lad—
Quite took into his royal head
A fancy for the fad.
So hail the cake-walk, to be sure,
Though beastly bores they be,
And give me courage to endure
"All Coons Seem the Same to Me."

An Oldtime Summer Resort

Claus Spreckels and family have gone to Aptos for the rest of the summer. The Spreckels's own a lot of property down that way and at one time they contemplated making a popular resort of Aptos. Somewhere around twenty-five years ago Spreckels senior built a hotel at Aptos, and it was opened with great eclat. A splendid table was served, with an ex-club chef to preside over the cuisine. It looked as if the hotel would become a big money-maker, when fate settled otherwise by burning it to the ground, and it was not rebuilt.

Gossip of the Service

Brigadier-General George H. Burton, Inspector-General U. S. A., is expected to arrive here sometime this month. He was on duty in this city for many years and with his family has many friends here. Major Ramsey D. Potts of the Artillery Corps has been ordered to San Francisco as Inspector-General on the staff of General Mc Arthur. Major Potts is at present in Manila. He formerly commanded one of the field batteries at the Presidio. Colonel W. L. Alexander will, it is understood, succeed General C. A. Woodruff, retired, as Chief Commissary of the Department of California. Major Ira McNutt of the Ordinance Department has been ordered to take command at the Benicia arsenal, to succeed Lieutenant-Colonel John F. Greer, who is to take station at Governor's Island, New York. Captain F. E. Johnson, who is on duty at the Presidio, left last Friday for the East on a month's leave of absence.

Mrs. Coolidge, wife of Colonel Charles A. Coolidge, gave a delightful reception at her husband's quarters at the Presidio last Monday evening, in honor of her guest, Miss Johnson, who is here from Vancouver Barracks.

Those who were looking forward to entertaining Mrs. Guy Edie and her husband, the Major, who was recently ordered to Monterey as surgeon in charge of the new camp, will probably be disappointed. I hear that Major Edie will not come West and his orders will be countermanded.

Movements and Whereabouts

William Morris loves fish as much as he does pictures, and he lately got up a party to go to King's river on a fishing trip. The party of ten left last week for the river.

The Stanley Jacksons are at Napa Soda Springs, where most of the Jackson connection spend at least a part of every summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Gus Costigan have returned from their wedding trip East and are stopping at a Van Ness avenue hotel till their new house in Sausalito is completed.

Mrs. Leon Greenbaum (Dorothy Heyneman) is seriously ill at the Hotel Rafael. She has three physicians in attendance.

The Three Cupids

Something was agog in the big house on Pacific avenue. Excitement seemed to centre about a certain chamber on the second floor from the oaken door of which a little French maid would tiptoe up to the waiting servants in the hall, whisper her orders and then steal back again. So great was the concern upon the faces of all that one would believe that one were dead, or at least grievously ill within, and the occasion was nearly as important, though not nearly so grave; for the debutante heiress was retiring early preparatory to her "coming out" at a tea to be given in her honor on the morrow.

Convent-bred, continent-traveled, polished and finished to the last degree of nicety, the Heiress had ever her opportunities to make discreet observations, and she had come of too blase a life to feel excitement or trepidation over so trivial a thing as another entrance into the world, yet the idea of the fuss and the frill that was going on in her cause gave her a quickening thought that was akin to the plebeian sensation as she lay in her bed at the end of her pricelessly pretty room, where she had been tucked and smoothed by her maid as though she had been an invalid or an expensive Parisian doll. Then her mother entered, as was her custom, and kissed her, as was also her custom, and departed with the unction of mechanical respectability, leaving the Heiress with her maid.

"Turn down the light, Marie," she said to the girl, "you may go."

The door closed softly and the Heiress slid almost immediately into sleep, and this is what she dreamed:

She thought that a little winged and naked boy came and sat at the foot of her bed and coquetted with her with large, blue eyes.

"Why do you look at me so?" asked the Heiress, after the gaze had passed the point of politeness

"Pardon me," said the tiny fellow coolly. "I thought it was about time we became acquainted. We will meet often in the world you are to inhabit after tomorrow, and an introduction might prove awkward."

"So you are Cupid," she said, seeing his sprouting wings.

"Perhaps," said the babe, rather cynically. "I am certainly the presiding deity of many linked hearts, and it matters not what I am called in the comic papers or the divorce courts. How do you think you will like me?"

"I have often read of love," said the girl, "and I think I shall not mind."

"Love!" said the little spirit gravely, "you have evidently taken me for somebody else."

"But are you not the god of love?" she asked anxiously.

The child's voice became suddenly hard and dry and he held up a golden amulet which hung from a cord at his neck.

"I have worn this from my birth," he said, "and I have been told that it was my name, although I'm sure it says nothing about Love."

And the girl took the amulet and looked at the letters upon it, and the word she read was "Mammon," and she turned her face away. A moment later she again looked for the boy, but he had grown suddenly old and his head was bald and toothless, and he vanished chuckling.

The girl awoke and turned on her side and fell asleep again, and in her dream another Cupid was waiting on her bed. This fellow was a gay little imp, and he held in his hand a glass which seemed to fill as fast as he drank from it.

"I certainly like your gayety," said the girl.

"I am discreet in my tippling," said the god, "for I am a man of the world."

"But aren't you ashamed at your age—a mere baby—to behave so intemperately?" said the girl in a shocked tone. "What can Venus be thinking of to allow her son such liberties?"

"I am the son of Venus's liberty," said the child, "and I am not so young as you think. Since the birth of man I have been the curse of man that has cursed woman."

"Will I meet you also out in the world to which I am going?"

"You will meet me, yes, but you will not know me. Few know me at sight by my right name."

"But are you not Love?" asked the Heiress, as she looked at the medallion which he also wore.

"Some fools call me so—but not for long," he said, hiding the disc of gold. "You cannot see my name, for it is not in my business to reveal it."

But the girl suddenly snatched the medallion from his hands and read upon it the word "Lust," and the child's face became so hideous and crafty that she fought him away and awoke with a scream.

And when she was calm again she once more fell asleep and the third Cupid sat by her side and studied her with eyes that thrilled her.

"I know you are Love," she said, "but I cannot tell why, for you surely look like the others, but for some reason I feel that you are not the same."

"I have no need to conceal my name," said the child. "I am Love, but I may be no better companion for you than the others.

"On the contrary, I want you to be mine always," said she, "for I want nothing so much as love."

"Wait and see," said Cupid. "Like the others you have seen, I also have a medallion."

"But why should I look at it, since I already know your name?"

"There is something written on the other side," he said, and he handed her the coin from his neck.

And on one side she read "Love," and on the other "Poverty." —The Oracle.

"You must grant," said Miss Softspoken, "that with all her faults there's one thing commendable about Amelia. She's thoroughly virtuous."

"Well, yes," drawled Miss Frank, "but I think Amelia's friends would like her better if she were less virtuous and not such a bore."

If Cabby Should Tell

(At the Grand this week Cheridah Simpson is singing a rattling topical, "If Cabby Told Half That He Knew." These are verses that she doesn't sing.)

The tales would be lurid and queer
If cabby told half that he knew!
The smart set would be out of gear;
The tales would be lurid and queer
Of the world that prefers fizz to beer,
And gives old Mephisto his due.
The tales would be lurid and queer—
If cabby told all that he knew.

The "climbers"—not "in" yet—would sneer,
If cabby told half that he knew.
Where the risque-inclined ones would leer
The "climbers"—not "in" yet—would sneer,
The ochre-hued newspapers jeer
At old Satan in giving his due.
The climbers—not "in" yet—would sneer—
If cabby told all that he knew!

There'd be blushes and many a tear
If cabby told half that he knew.
There'd be lots of divorces, I fear,
There'd be blushes and many a tear,
If the facts in the case should appear,
When Beelzebub gives all his due.
There'd be blushes and many a tear—
If cabby told all that he knew!

The tales would be lurid and queer,
The climbers—not "in" yet—would sneer,
There'd be blushes and many a tear—
If cabby told all that he knew!

(The Press Club's Cat.)

Thy gaze, transfixed, disdains my presence, small,
And lingers on creations of thine own;
The twitching of thy lip betrays the strange
And startling wonders of thy retrospect.
Perchance these walls give place to jungle briars,
And curious gapers turn to hunted prey?
Perhaps within thy reminiscent brain
Lurk dreams of summer nights when stealthy forms
Cast undulating shadows 'neath the moon?
I think 'tis so; despite thy stolid mien
A sudden light burns green within thine eyes,
Ferocious hate leaps high as thought recalls
How mortal cunning wrought thine impotence.
By means unworthy living thing, save man,
They have thee caged, and harmless, by a trick.
They took thy body captive, but thy pride
Remains thine own, and clothes thy haughty form
In solemn garb of peerless majesty.
I gaze at thee and feel my littleness,
And slink away; ashamed that man presumes
From his conceit, to call himself thy lord.

MABEL PORTER PITTS.

I Don't Know

"Do you like that expression, 'Search me'?" asked the lexicographer.

"Well, that depends," returned the professor. "If for instance I asked one of my woman friends, 'Are you of the knock-kneed or bow-legged variety?' the answer would scarcely be delicate." —The Prude.

No Right to Read Wife's Letters

Here is something that will interest the wife who periodically protests against her husband's opening her mail. As a result of repeated requests by postmasters throughout the country for a ruling on this point the postal authorities have just issued the following order:

"A husband has no right to receive the mail addressed to his wife against her wishes.

"As to the mail addressed to the children, the father has the prior right to receive it unless there be some particular circumstance in the case which the Department might take into consideration on a statement of the facts being presented."

A WONDERFUL SALE.

The announcement of Kelly & Liebes' great removal sale created a stir, as was prophesied, and thousands of garments have been sold. This week several hundred wrappers are placed on sale in connection with cloaks, suits, skirts and waists. The selling price of the wrappers will be 65 cents; former price, $1.50.

Automobile Topics

Every day one hears of some new convert to automobilism. The horseless carriage germ is being disseminated with remarkable speed on this coast, and the time is not far distant when not to own an auto will be as humiliating as to be without a tuxedo. Mrs. Phoebe Hearst is the latest convert. It was not so long ago that she sought to discourage her son from taking trips through Europe on his auto, for she heard of some of his hazardous journeys over mountainous roads, but now she has a horseless carriage, a forty-horse power Mors auto which arrived here two weeks ago, and which is in charge of the Pioneer Auto Company

* * * *

John D. Spreckels having become a convert to automobilism, I should not be surprised to learn before long that the Park Commissioners had been prevailed upon to amend their rules with a view of giving auto owners a little more freedom in our great pleasure ground. Mr. Spreckels should be able to convince his brother Adolph, the Park Commissioner, that the restrictions placed upon autos are unreasonable. Adolph is a most ardent lover of horseflesh, but when he sees John D. manipulating that handsome big machine perhaps he will decide to try one too.

* * * *

The amateur automobilist tried to scorch along the principal thoroughfare and after he was dug out of the wreck a doctor was summoned from the crowd.

"I can't do any good," said the doctor, "I'm a veterinary surgeon."

"You're just the man," said the amateur, "I was a jackass to think I could run that machine."

* * * *

The growing popularity of the automobile was evidenced by the prominence given to machines in the parades on the Fourth throughout the State. Many towns gave prizes for races. At Vallejo, Whittel's imported Mors won first prize and at Boulder Creek Fred A. Jacobs's Knox was the winner.

* * * *

Mr. C. S. Middleton has purchased from the National Automobile Company a four cylinder Toledo Touring Car, with which he and his family will tour throughout the State. The car has a speed of fifty miles per hour and it cost five thousand. The National company, by the way, has ten car loads of machines en route to this city. There are fifty-five machines aboard valued at seventy-five thousand dollars.

* * * *

It is believed that great impetus will be given to the automobile industry on this coast when the building of the Pacific Automobile Company is completed at the corner of Golden Gate avenue and Octavia. This is the institution projected by such men as E. P. Brinegar, Harry D. Morton, Frank Lee, Byron Jackson and others who have invested over one hundred thousand dollars in the enterprise. The ground floor will be devoted to automobile storage and will have a capacity for three hundred machines. There will also be reception rooms for ladies and gentlemen, and a machine shop. —The Automobilist.

Danae of 1903

A Rich Old Man had long coveted the Smiles of a Beautiful Young Society Girl. She, however, like Floria Tosca, had a lover nearer her Own Age toward whom her Heart tenderly inclined.

The Rich Old Man might have gone to work like Scarpia and woven an Intrigue that would end with the Girl in his toils, but he had no Diplomatic Gift, and to Brute Force he was not Partial. He had been a Porter in his Youth and the hard work had given him in his Later Years a Distaste for everything involving Muscular Effort.

He thought of another Plan much simpler and in which only a trifle of Diplomacy, not enough to cause Brain Fag, was necessary.

He simply spent his Money like Water. He bought a Yacht and an Automobile, a high Trap, a Drag and a Stable of Magnificent Horses. He set up a Kennel of Blooded Bullpups, and he did everything in his Power to make the Poor Youth look like Thirty Cents.

By and by the Girl became tired of Love with nothing Substantial behind it, and the Shower of Gold continually falling around her felt mighty good.

So she dropped into the Old Chap's arms.

There's no particular moral to this. Jove conquers Danae every day in the Society World by just such Manœuvres as this. —The Fabler.

Rainier beer has won for itself a popularity that would be above all understanding, were it not that the reason of this favor is so patent. Rainier is decidedly the best beer on the market. It is absolutely pure, refreshing and pleasing to the palate.

STAGE

The Binghams

Amelia Bingham has a nice, handsome dark husband who makes the finest possible foil for her blonde prettiness. The two are devoted and Bingham, by the way, is the lady's real name—by marriage. Her maiden name, not being euphonious, she took her husband's name for her stage name. Mr. and Mrs. Bingham are devotedly attached and he usually accompanies his wife. They are blessed with this world's goods, too, and in their New York home everything is as elegant as are the blue plush curtains, richly embroidered with Miss Bingham's coat of arms and monogram, which decorate the stage at the beginning of each performance. The Bingham home is one of Miss Bingham's fads and there are Louis Quatorze rooms and Napoleon rooms, in which every piece of furniture is authentic. Everything in the house is pale blue, as that is Miss Bingham's color and makes the most effective background for her blondeness. House decoration is also the fad of Clyde Fitch, the young millionaire play-builder, and his New York home is groaning with the treasures of European palaces. It's an interesting story how the play in which Miss Bingham stars, "The Climbers," was hawked about by Fitch to every manager in New York. Nobody would touch it because of the scene after the funeral, with which the play opens. After all the men had said "Nay, nay, Clydie," Fitch offered it to Miss Bingham, who said she would do and dare it. She called together a company in the middle of the season and opened in New York in January. "The Climbers" at once climbed into popular favor and ran for five hundred nights in New York—proving the biggest money-maker that Fitch ever wrote. Since then it has been two seasons on the road and it has proved a little fortune to author and actress-manager.

Could Some Power the Giftie Gie Us

I wondered the other night if the scene after the Christmas dinner, when the servants came in to clear the table, suggested anything to certain members of our smart set. One of them remarked as he finished a glass of champagne, "Very dull dinner—not a clever thing said." Another said, "Did you see that fellow shove in the food?" and the third remarked, "Oh, he's one of those singing chaps asked to help fill in the time after dinner." That should have struck home in some quarters, but self-complacency is thick. But it's not a bad thing to remember that servants think and their viewpoint would be mighty interesting, I should think.

Ferdinand Gottschalk, of Amelia Bingham's company, was with Rosina Vokes when that still lamented comedienne used to produce her little plays. He has many friends in San Francisco.

Sothern Gone Mad Over Press Agents

They say that E. H. Sothern has gone perfectly daft over press agents. Formerly he didn't believe in them at all and he scarcely permitted his name to go into the paper—so reserved and shy was he. Now he has gone over to the opposite extreme and he can't get enough newspaper advertising. Anything goes for a newspaper yarn—the star even invents things that his name may be constantly kept before the public, and he is willing to pay anything for a good advertising scheme. The story that he is to star next year with Julia Marlowe in Shakespearean roles is but one of these fakes, for why should the two give for two dollars what people are willing to pay four dollars to see? It is said, too, that the rumored engagement of Miss Illington to Dan Frohman, which she is forbidden to deny, comes from the same source, though it has a basis of fact in this—that some one is certainly booming Miss Illington very hard, either through personal interest in her or, as has been stated, because she has money behind her. But there's one consolation and that is that she has far more talent than some of those who have been boomed because—well, simply because.

The fault of White Whittlesey's impersonation of the hero of "Brother Officers" is that he makes the transition from the unlettered Hinds to Hinds of the drawing-room too pronounced. A woman might adapt herself to new circumstances with such celerity, but scarcely a man, particularly one with Hinds's natural diffidence. Whittlesey will be at home next week in the part of Rudolph of Hentzau. In the Zenda play will debut Harry Hilliard, the Alcazar's new juvenile. Hall Caine's "The Manxman" will be the next production, with Whittlesey in James O'Neill's great part.

Some Vaudeville Stars

Miss Mabel McKinley, the niece of the late President, who made her appearance at the Orpheum this week, is a sweet soprano who sings "Il Bacio" in a way that shows that her voice has had good training. Though her singing is not brilliant it is pleasing. The song "Anona" is sung with considerable artistic effect, but her rendition of "The Rosary" is somewhat of a disappointment. However Miss McKinley is blessed with considerable vocal talent and she should meet with success on the vaudeville stage. She is especially fortunate in having such a brilliant accompanist as Oscar Luckstone. One of the most amusing sketches that has been presented at the Orpheum in a long time is "A Pressing Matter," in which Charles Dickson and Nell McEwen appear, and perhaps the biggest hit of the week, though not the headliner, is Julian Rose, the Hebrew dialect artist. Though he reminds you of no other dialect comedian, he impersonates a type that is easily recognized. His stories are bright, and they are refreshingly free from any suggestion of vulgarity.

Price's Profitable Trip

During ten busy days in New York E. D. Price, general manager of the Belasco and Mayer theatres and road companies, accomplished results which promise to afford much future satisfaction to local play-goers. He engaged half a dozen players of reputation and special skill, who will be added to the Alcazar company at the opening of the autumn season. He also skimmed the cream from the play market and brought home a trunkful of recent Eastern successes. Incidentally he perfected the tour of Florence Roberts, which lasts for thirty weeks after her September engagement at the Alcazar, and engaged several members of the original company presenting "The Dairy Farm," which enjoyed great vogue in the East, but is now west of Denver. Belasco and Mayer are to send it out for an extended Pacific coast tour, and promise it the finest scenic equipment and cast bestowed upon any play of rustic life.

Should Take Up Comedy

Nance O'Neil's comedy is so charming that I do not see why she does not elaborate that phase of her art instead of depending entirely on her tragic talent. Jane Hading, who is an emotional actress of wondrous art, does not disdain comedy. Ada Rehan, who might have become the greatest of Camilles, was wisely—considering the plethora of emotion on the stage—turned into a great comedienne by Augustin Daly. There are many actresses who can do strong tragic and emotional work, but how few comediennes of worth! Now Nance O'Neil is great in tragic roles, where she wrings the heart, but when she plays comedy such as the light scenes of "La Tosca" and "Magda" she touches a new chord, and a pleasanter one, in her auditor. She used to play Lady Teazle, but she has given it up of late years. She should have a try at Rosalind, and Katherine in "The Taming of the Shrew," and the graceful heroine of "Much Ado About Nothing." Nance O'Neil is probably one of the most serious students among stars. She never takes up a part for study that she does not read all the outside literature on the character that she can secure, from ancient history to modern magazine articles.

At the Central

The talented Cooper children without a doubt inherit their dramatic gifts from their mother. Georgie Woodthorpe has acted many roles in her time, and she now ranks as one of the best character actresses on the Western stage. She is a versatile little woman and this week does a cake walk in "Kidnapped," in her character of Mrs. McMooney, with Jim Corrigan. The latter in his role of Policeman McMooney has managed to please the Central audiences all this week. There will be one more week of his starship and then will come the opening of the new stock season. Herschel Mayall will make his debut as leading man at this theatre, in a spectacular production of "Faust." Scenic artists have been engaged for weeks in preparing for the big event. "Faust" will be the most elaborate production ever seen at the Central.

Camille Will Sing

The Tivoli company is rehearsing "The Highwayman," which is to be put on for the first time at popular prices week after next. The management succeeded in making terms with Camille D'Arville, whose work in the soprano part of Lady Constance Sinclair placed the opera in the top notch of success in the East, and she has been engaged for the production. "The Highwayman" is by Smith and De Koven. It will be given with all the original stage business and the scenery will be modeled after the New York production. One of the big parts is that of Foxy Quiller which will be taken by Edwin Stevens. Bertha Davis will appear as Lady Pamela, Annie Myers as Doll Primrose, Edward Webb as Toby Winkle, Oscar Lee as Captain Rodney and Arthur Cunningham as Dick Fitzgerald.

New Weberfield at Fischer's

Although "Twirly Whirly" is still turning away crowds at Fischer's, the management has decided to remove it after this week. They have so many good plays on hand that they could really continue two years if they ran each play a fortnight. The bill Monday night will be a combination of two burlesques, "Under the Red Globe" and "The Three Musketeers." A small fortune has been expended for the scenery, the costumes and the paraphernalia that are required for "Under the Red Globe." There will be new faces among the principals and a larger chorus for both the ensembles and the dances. Among the new features are the latest song, "The Leader of Vanity Fair," sung by Maude Amber and the chorus, "The Peroxide Sisters," song and dance by Misses Hope and Emerson, "For Love is King," arranged for and sung by Winfield Blake, "Soldiers," a funny song and march, acted and sung by Kolb, Dill, Bernard and Whelan, a new coon song and dance in which six little clog dancers will help out Kolb and Dill, "Oh, Fudge," a new topical song by Harry Hermsen, and some specialty numbers by the quartet.

Maclyn Arbuckle, who is to create the title role in George Ade's new spectacular comedy-drama, "The County Chairman" next season, made his first appearance upon the stage in Shreveport, Louisiana. Before that he was a successful lawyer in St. Louis and later in Texas. Arbuckle was a member of T. D. Frawley's first San Francisco stock company.

John G. Sparks, the delineator of Irish character, so long identified with the Rich and Harris Broadway productions, has been secured for the chief male part in "The Chaperons" next season. This musical extravaganza will tour the Western country with nearly all of the original New York cast.

Wilton Lackaye will appear in "Othello" and the dramatization of Frank Norris's "The Pit" next season.

There is no more refreshing drink at this season than a high-ball of Chapin & Gore.

Following Nance O'Neil at the California comes the new Neill-Morosco company, one of the strongest stock organizations ever seen in the West. During the season here will be produced "In the Palace of the King," "Hearts Aflame," "Janice Meredith," "Mrs. Dane's Defense," "The Royal Family," "Notre Dame" and "The Way of the World." The Neill-Morosco company is the only organization in America authorized to produce these plays at popular prices.

Features of Next Week's Bills

As "A Modern Magdalen" will be played for only a week at the Columbia, a special Wednesday matinee is to be given in addition to the regular Saturday matinee. Wilton Lackaye will appear in his great interpretation of the father in this play. There is a very interesting story in "A Modern Magdalen," though on entirely different lines from "The Climbers." An impecunious bohemian father, a second wife, an invalid daughter and the beautiful truant step-daughter of the title role, a wealthy money lender, a student lover and a gay man about town are some of the characters. It promises to be of unusual interest.

Nance O'Neil's old standby, "The Jewess," will be the California's bill tonight and tomorrow night. On Monday Miss O'Neil will give us her conception of the gentle, ill-fated Juliet. She played this character in Australia but it is new here. Ratcliff will be Romeo and Millward, Dempsey and the others will be of the cast.

The Grand continues to do a land office business with the musical eccentricity, "In Central Park." It will begin its third week tomorrow night, to be succeeded by "In Wall Street."

In "The Prisoner of Zenda" White Whittlesey will show us what he can do with James K. Hackett's famous role. "The Prisoner" will be a sumptuous production and will doubtless be as big a triumph as "Monbars" and "Heartsease."

"Under the Red Globe" and "The Three Musketeers" will be Fischer's new bill. Some surprises are promised.

The revival of "Wang" has proved so successful that, with the same cast, it will go another week at the Tivoli.

The jolly farce comedy "Muldoon's Picnic," with James Corrigan in the star role, will crowd the Central. This will be Corrigan's last week.

Julian Rose will stay another week at the Orpheum and Mabel McKinley will sing the waltz song from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," a "Danza" by Chadwick and a Japanese love song. Charles Dickson will present a new sketch, "Heart to Heart Talks," the scene laid in a newspaper office, where the sporting editor has been called upon to handle the women's department. The new people will be headed by De Kolta, the wizard who after eight months of success at New York's Eden Musee makes his American vaudeville debut here. Bailey and Madison, grotesque eccentrics from England and the principal Eastern cities will also be new. Hodges and Launchmere, the "American Nightingales" in medleys, German yodling, piano solos and fancy buck and wing dancing, are old favorites.

At the Chutes will be George Hanlon and sons, late of "Superba" in their sketch "Phunny Phrolicks." "The Coontown Disturbers," Van Fossen and McCauley, comedy singers and dancers, will make their first appearance here, as will also Marion George, a talented violinist. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

When Steinegger Met Leschetitzky

"My first meeting with Leschetitzky," said Emil Steinegger, who has just returned from four years' study in Vienna, "took place at his summer home in Ischl. Having received a telegram from him reading 'Ankunft zu melden,' I went at once. I arrived there Sunday morning, and found him with his wife and two pretty American girls. His first movement, after greetings were exchanged, was to offer me a cigarette. The offer was good-naturedly extended to the girls—Vienna women are not strangers to the cigarette. He then took me into his room, a front one, and drew my attention to the view from his window, exclaiming, 'Schauen lie hieber?' That remark showed that Nature was his church. Having heard so much about Leschetitzky's autocratic manner I was surprised to find him in such an amiable mood. However the girls told me afterward that one could not have found him in better humor; an autocrat off duty does not always wear his official air. Two very pleasant hours were spent, chiefly in listening to the master's tales of his interesting experiences. He does not believe in overexertion. His teaching begins in earnest in January, ending the last of May. Some Boston pupils come in January and stay until his season ends.

What "A Pupil" Means

"My motive in going to Vienna was to discover how technic is developed, and to see if there is really a short cut to virtuosity. To be a pupil of Leschetitzky, as some use the term, is nevertheless a farce. Last season over ninety pupils came from America, stayed one year, had one lesson from the professor and then went home advertising themselves as 'pupils of Leschetitzky.' This is an absurdity and a swindle as well, for these pupils really study under the 'vorbereiters,' or preparatory teachers. From these they take two or three lessons a week except in August and September. These 'vorbereiters' are inferior teachers, many American instructors at home being by far their superiors.

The Master's Methods

"One day, when by appointment I met Leschetitzky, I asked him about 'methods.'

"'Methods?' he returned, 'there is no method. I have no method. Nature is my method.'

"He became interested in my detail work and inside of two and a half hours told me his experiences from boyhood—what he did to develop his muscles.

"'The same muscles,' he said, 'that one uses in turning a strong key in a stiff lock are the ones to develop for piano work. Strictly speaking, the vital point is the arched hand. Sunken knuckles are bad. All hope vanishes for great work by whoever sinks the knuckles and then raises the fingers, as the Stuttgart Conservatory advocates. The true road to success,' said Leschetitzky, 'lies in the brain and not the fingers. Memorizing is absolutely necessary if one wishes to become more than ordinary. Nine out of ten pupils do not understand this "arched hand" and it is of the utmost importance to be able to discriminate. The "grabbing" muscles lead to disappointment, while the "taking" muscles lead to success.'"

With Regard to Going Abroad

Mr. Steinegger considers it absurd for any one to say that it is not necessary to go abroad to study music. He believes in getting the groundwork from a good teacher here, but the higher study must be found in the music centres of Europe. "Musicians," he said, "who claim to be able to teach as well as in Europe were there once upon a time themselves, the only difference being that they could not earn the salt for their bread there, so they come to the land of dollars and plenty. Joking aside, many American piano teachers are bad advisers. They handle all pupils alike. They do not as a rule advise their professional pupils to advance themselves under theorists." In the old country there is more discrimination, and more incentive to ambition, Mr. Steinegger says.

"Leschetitzky is one of the remaining few celebrities. He has had great experience. He is intimately acquainted with nearly all the renowned people. None of the great ones have ever made America their home. So long as the remaining few last it will always be worth while for the professional student to get ideas and advice from them. Amateurs can easily be handled in America but the professional will have to broaden his mind by visiting historic parts."

Studied with Miss Withrow

Marie Tempest, who is to go upon the stage again and take her high-born husband with her, is very well known to San Franciscans in London. She studied voice for a time with Marie Withrow, and has always been most enthusiastic over the Californian woman's method of instruction. Marie Tempest (Mrs. Cosmo-Lenox) is said to have the smallest eyes of any stage beauty, and yet the execution she can do with those eyes is wonderful. Her name was Marie Etherington and she is London born, though so many take her for an American. She was educated in a Brussels convent, and later went to Paris and then to London where she studied at the Royal Academy of Music. Her father was dead and her mother had no idea of letting Marie go upon the stage, but she had a fine soprano voice and it called for cultivation. Emanuel Garcia, however, looked upon his pupil as the coming prima donna, especially since during her eighteen months at the Academy she carried off all the medals, bronze, silver and gold. Then she took a course under Randegger, who also predicted stage success for her. She made her debut in "Boccaccio" at the London Garden. After other successes she appeared in Cellier's "Dorothy," playing it for nine hundred nights at the Lyric and Prince of Wales. In private life, Californians who have met her say she is charming. She is absolutely devoted to her husband, who returns the devotion with interest.

And Pauline Hall

Pauline Hall, "the girl with the red waist," as she was known in early days in California, is also to return to comic opera. Pauline first sang at the Tivoli years ago, but her name was not widely known till she hit New York and sang for one thousand nights on a stretch in "Erminie." Miss Hall revisited San Francisco a few years ago, singing in "Dorcas." In private life she is Mrs. George B. McClellan and she lives in West Seventy-seventh street, New York.

While Wilson Leaves

While Marie Tempest and Pauline Hall are coming back, Francis Wilson is to leave comic opera. He will be a plain comedian, non-singing, next season. I remember when Sidney Rosenfeld adapted Lecocq's "La Jolie Persanne" for Wilson under the title "The Oolah." That was Wilson's first big success, though not on its premier. Rosenfeld had received many substantial benefits at the hands of Wilson, and whenever Rosenfeld wanted one hundred dollars, or even one thousand dollars, he could depend upon Wilson to let him have it. "The Oolah" was sold to Wilson outright, Rosenfeld agreeing to make any necessary changes. On the first night everybody, before and behind the curtain, knew that the piece was what is known in theatrical parlance as a "frost." Wilson had risked a lot of money on the production, and he was in despair. Next day, he called on Rosenfeld, and said: "Now, Rosy, my boy, this is where we must do some great work on the opera," and then proceeded to outline the alterations needful. Rosenfeld refused to make any changes whatever, unless a new contract was made whereby he should receive five per cent of the gross receipts. Wilson engaged another librettist, who made a new piece from the old materials. After "The Oolah" he had other successes, but he is tired of comic opera now and wants a change. —The Music Critic.

Helas!

In her curtained and perfumed chamber in the Rue de Choiseul, Paris, the beautiful American girl, Miss Indianna Smith, lay dead, stabbed by her own hand. The instrument of death, a jeweled dagger of the Renaissance, lay beside her, and clasped to her heart was the following letter:

"My dear parents,

"I die by my own hand. Forgive me. Fate alone is to blame. Young, rich and beautiful, the betrothed of a prince, why do I choose death? Because destiny has been too unkind. You, my parents, led me at an early age to dear Paris, far away from the nakedness, the crudity of my native land, so lacking in a past, an atmosphere, in everything (save money) essential to a refined and cultured soul. You kept from me the dreadful secret that my grandfather was a grocer, a common, hideous grocer, a dealer in tea and sugar, soap and molasses! I write these awful words with a full conception of their monstrosity. To be sure, my name, the unromantic one of Smith, awoke misgiving, but then, there are Smiths and Smiths, not to mention Smythes! But the truth can no longer be concealed. The secret of my lineage stands revealed in all its nakedness. A Smith, and a grocer! An Austrian prince of the bluest blood has asked for my hand (with my fortune in it). Can I allow him to join his noble lineage with a Smith whose grandfather sold molasses? Never, never. Why was I born an American? I, whose tastes and instincts equal those of a princess of the blood! I, whose aristocratic affiliations scorn the plebeian associations of the country where I first saw the light. I do not blame you, my parents, for the misfortune of my birth. You could not help being Smiths. My paternal grandfather, the grocer, could not foresee that his granddaughter should have been born a duchess. Fate should have been more kind. My misfortunes began before my birth. Why was I not descended from a Baron of the Empire, a Prince of Servia, an Italian count, a Spanish hidalgo—from anybody except an American grocer? Not all the glitter of the Smith gold can conceal my origin. Of what use are toilettes, diamonds, equipages, to one whose soul is consumed by secret sorrow? No, it is too much. The dagger with which I intend to close my miserable existence lies before me. It is said that it belonged to Lucrezia Borgia. No such vulgar means as poison or illuminating gas shall put an end to my life. An aristocrat in life, I shall remain one in death. Oh, my unhappy parents, why did you bring me into existence?

"Your unfortunate child. Indianna Smith."

LETTERS

A Politico-Social Romance

"The Fighting Chance" is an uncommonly clever story. It is a political and social romance, in which a number of people have just a fighting chance of obtaining the desire of their hearts. There is a charming hostess who has a nephew, the apple of her eye, whom she longs to see in a position which will secure for him a political career; and a distinguished and dignified statesman, who has a fighting chance for preferment, though he himself is not aware that his appointment has an element of chance in it. Then, there is his private secretary, who has the fighting chance of continuing to occupy the same position, relatively, when the great man moves farther up, and there is Edith Deming, already married and disillusioned, who has her chance of freedom and new ties, and last and most, Blanche Adrian, a most ingenious ingenue, whose like is not to be found outside "The Secret Orchard." All of these people come together at Ilkley Villa, the summer residence of Mrs. de la Mar, and it is there, in the brief space of a few days, that the comedies and tragedies of six lives work themselves out and the fighting chances are lost or won. One cannot help speculating on what came after the last page—when every one discovered, as each must, on what a slender if his own chance hung; whether Mrs. de la Mar forgave Kenneth when she found that he had not, after all, sacrificed his career, or whether Edith and John Townsend made up their quarrel when they found that there was nothing else; whether Claridge Robertson cared more for his lost bride or his fallen fortunes, and most of all, what Kenneth thought when he learned to know his wife. The dialogue is bright and sparkling, but not of that dazzling, glittering order which resembles a flashing electric sign more than human conversation. It is a good book for summer reading, but does not belong to the "hammock" variety, which can be begun anywhere and left half-finished, for any one who takes up Gertrude Lynch's story will be wide awake from beginning to end. It is reprinted from the Smart Set, and published by the Ess Ess Company.

Collaboration appears to be the literary fad of the hour. Lothrop announces, amongst the new books to be brought out, "A Parish of Two," the joint work of H. G. McVickor, a New York society man, and "Percy Collins," under which pseudonym a well-known metropolitan clergyman is concealing his identity. The theme and treatment, if one may judge by advance notices, is nearly identical with that of the "Kempton-Wace Letters," since it is to be a love-story told in an exchange of correspondence between a club man and a clergyman.

A unique bit of collaboration will be that of "The World's Children," written by Dorothy Menpes. It will contain one hundred illustrations by her father, Mortimer Menpes, and these will be engraved and printed in color by Maud Menpes, a sister of the author. Miss Dorothy Menpes is one of the youngest women writers. She is the author of that series of articles in M. A. P. signed "The Painter's Youngest Daughter." Miss Maud Menpes received her early art education from her father, and later, studied color-reproduction in Germany.

The Passing of the Serial

Apparently Black and White is of the opinion that the passing of the serial is a bad thing for authors, and perhaps it is if one looks only to the loss of the sum they have counted on in exchange for serial rights, but whatever may be the case in London or on the European continent, the fact remains in the United States that the serialized novel has seen its best days. Whether it be that the times have so changed that people have no longer the patience to take fiction in segments, or whether the rush of modern life leaves their minds in such a chaotic condition that they cannot find one end of the thread to tie to the beginning of the next, the serialization of novels is no longer counted upon by editors of periodicals as a means of either increasing their circulation or attracting especial attention. Most people prefer to read their fiction through without interruption, and Lippincott's and the Smart Set make a specialty of supplying a complete novel to their patrons every month. The St. Nicholas ceased to publish serial stories for children some time ago, and though the majority of the monthly magazines still adhere to established custom and publish articles or novels in installments it frequently happens that some one of them depends for months consecutively on short stories. Time was when a novel was published serially, and did not appear in book form for months, or even years later, but now, before the final chapters have been printed in the magazine the book in its completed form is for sale at the stores and news stalls. It is not likely that any one or a dozen readers could give an explanation of what is the universal fact, that they no longer enjoy stories on the installment plan. It is questionable whether serialization has really much effect on the success of a book. If it is poor, people discover its shortcomings the sooner, and if it is good they are prepared to read it in its entirety. It is not improbable that odd installments of a serial may occasionally act the part of introducer between writer and reader, but such chance-made acquaintances are as little apt to end in permanent friendships as those made on railway journeys. The same peculiarities follow people into their reading as into their other affairs. Some become permanently attached to a few favorites, while others take up with the last new one, and some flit about like butterflies, neither knowing nor caring with whom they spend their time as long as they enjoy themselves. There are methodical people who can divide their days into half-hours, and apportion one period to history, one to science, one to poetry and another to fiction, and to such, perhaps, the serialization of any subject would seem an eminently proper treatment. Others like to finish what they begin, and to them a serial is a nightmare.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Virginian," by Owen Wister:

"The spirit will go one road, and the thought another, and the body its own way sometimes.

Scipio: There's times in life, when a man has got to have courage without convictions—without them—or he is no good.

The Virginian: A middlin' doctor is a pore thing, and a middlin' lawyer is a pore thing; but keep me from a middlin' man of God.

The Virginian: A man, any full-sized man, ought to own a big lot of temper. And like all his valuable possessions, he'd ought to keep it and not lose any.

The Judge: The whole secret lies in the way you treat people. As soon as you treat men as your brothers, they are ready to acknowledge you—if you deserve it—as their superior. That's the whole bottom of Christianity.

I knew he was a good man; and I also knew that if a missionary is to be tactless, he might almost as well be bad.

Molly's Aunt: So long as you can help it, never marry! But when you cannot help it a moment longer, then listen to nothing but that.

Scipio: When a man ain't got no ideas of his own, he'd ought to be kind o' careful who he borrows 'em from.

Lin McLean: It's bein' engaged scares yu'. Marriage restores your courage, I find.

Molly: There's a higher courage than fear of outside opinion.

Although the fatted calf is an animal that can assume more divergent shapes than any known creature—being sometimes champagne and partridges and sometimes cake and currant wine—through each disguise you can always identify the same calf.

Nothing's queer except marriage and lightning. Them two occurrences can still give me a sensation of surprise.

Good things have to be engraved on the memory; bad ones stick there of themselves.—Charles Reade.

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of San Francisco. They're After Him

The troubles of Mayor Schmitz are now multiplying. For a long time he appeared to enjoy the esteem of all the dailies; he had cultivated their favor with great success, and they appeared to be blind to his shortcomings. Those that were not under obligations to him for political favor were deterred from criticising him through fear of arousing the ire of his friends of the labor unions. So the ex-fiddler had no occasion to worry himself. Town Talk was the only paper that exposed the character of the relationship that existed between the Mayor and his enterprising mentor, Abe Ruef, or told how they were manipulating public affairs for their own selfish ends, and the echoes of their squeals have frequently fallen on the editorial ear, together with murmurs of threats of retaliation. But while the dailies kept their hands off the thrifty twain pursued the even tenor of their way believing themselves secure, and even reckoning upon fooling the people for another term. But the silence of the dailies has been broken. Mr. De Young of the Chronicle and Mr. Spreckels of the Call have served notice through their papers that the Schmitz-Ruef partnership must retire from business. The two morning Republican dailies have a candidate of their own for Mayor, and they intend to see to it that Abe Ruef is not perpetuated in politics. So the anti-Schmitz campaign is now on. The Mayor's apathy in the Mershon scandal is the pretext seized upon by the dailies to find fault with the Administration. If Mershon's charges were all that could be urged against Schmitz then it would hardly be fair to condemn, for the ex-Civil Service Commissioner is unworthy of belief. The Schmitz administration has been a scandal from the beginning. The high office has been more shamefully prostituted than at any time since the days of Kalloch, but heretofore the dailies have maintained a respectful attitude toward the unholy alliance. The interest they have taken in the Mershon case is purely political.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

Russia's Bluff

A Washington correspondent of the Bulletin was vouchsafed half a column of space the other day, in which to explain to the readers of that paper that the State Department regards the Kisheneff petition and the Manchurian question as entirely separate and distinct matters. "It is learned," he wrote, "that the State Department considers the Kisheneff petition has no connection with and is separate and distinct from the negotiations for opening of ports in Manchuria." This is perhaps a polite way of assuring people that the State Department is not affected with paresis, for if it confounded the complications in the Far East, growing out of Russia's treaty-breaking designs, with the issue involved in the Kisheneff petition, then there would be occasion for suspicion regarding the soundness of Mr. Hay's mind. It is very likely that the frowns of Russia's statesmen, ostensibly provoked by the Kisheneff petition, were in reality affected in furtherance of a by-play in connection with the Manchurian project, but there is no reason why Secretary Hay should connect both issues. The questions involved are in no way related. Russia has a perfect right to reject the Kisheneff petition, and suggest that we should move out of our glass house before throwing stones, but that retort could have no bearing upon the Manchurian question. The conviction is growing that Russia is running a bluff and that nothing but the stern certainty of war will check the unscrupulous policy of Muscovite aggrandizement. England is anxious for this country to take the first decisive step toward calling the Russian bluff, and it looks very much as though Mr. Hay would like to accommodate the British diplomats. Perhaps the Kisheneff affair might be made the pretext for the severance of friendly relations. But that sort of thing would be decidedly in violation of American tradition. We have a record for direct, straightforward methods of diplomacy, and there is no occasion for emulating the unscrupulous cunning of the statesmen of Europe.

Murderers at Liberty

Diplomatic etiquette appears to restrain the Governments of Europe from insisting on the punishment of the men who participated in the Servian butchery. Immediately after the assassination of King Alexander and his wife it was said that the monarchs of Europe, mindful of the possible consequences to themselves of the horrible example furnished in Belgrade, would demand of the new sovereign the punishment of the murderers. But the murderers are still posing triumphantly as patriots. However there is undoubtedly more or less uneasiness in the courts of Europe, for there are many personages abroad who today are pretenders but tomorrow may be kings. There is Don Carlos for instance. He claims to be Carlos VII, the rightful King of Spain by virtue of his descent from Don Carlos, brother of King Ferdinand VII, and also that he should be King Charles XI of France since the death of Comte de Chambord, when the elder line of the House of Bourbon became extinct. Twice the Carlists have taken up arms for him in Spain, and they still remain a political power. Then there is a pretender to the Portuguese throne in the person of Dom Miguel II, whose father fought unsuccessfully for the crown in the last century. Another Portuguese pretender is Prince Pedro d'Alcantara, who if every man had his rights would today be Emperor of Brazil. Italy has its pretender in Prince Alfonso who claims to be King of Naples and the two Sicilies. He has his official organ and his political adherents in Naples. In Italy, too, is carried on active propaganda in favor of Don Juan Skanderbeg who claims to be the Prince of Albania. Another of the "kings in exile" who have made Paris their retreat is Prince Guy de Lusignan, who claims to be King of Armenia, Cyprus and Jerusalem. His throne is very shadowy but he has designed two attractive decorations which he confers with much solemnity on persons whose merit he approves. Other pretenders are the Duke of Orleans and Prince Victor Napoleon in France and the famous Sobieski Stuarts in England. So it behooves the crowned heads to worry over such a soul-stirring and blood-curdling affair as the Belgrade butchery, for it showed with what ease designing persons may foster a revolution and shorten the reign of a proud and haughty monarch. Yet the only sovereign who appears to have profited by the experience of Alexander and Draga is the new King of Servia. It is said that he keeps in touch with a few dynamite bombs on all occasions. He is said to be an expert shot but he prefers bombs to pistols. He remarked the other day that if Alexander had one or two on the fatal night he could have defied any number of conspirators. If bombs are good things to throw at Kings, why shouldn't Kings arm themselves with bombs to throw at their enemies?

He Preaches Faith

It is refreshing in this degenerate, religion-made-easy day to come across an old-fashioned preacher of the type of the Rev. Thomas Scott Bacon, of Frederick county, Maryland. He has written a pamphlet on "The Great Apostasy of the Twentieth Century," in which he complains that the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," etc., does not enlist as it should the thoughts and aspirations of the Christian people, and is not sufficiently dwelt upon in the sermons that are preached. The reverend gentleman is one of the old-school preachers. He is aggressively orthodox and he has no desire to scrutinize the motives of Providence or to reconcile the works of God with scientific principles. The Bible is good enough for him, and he has no patience with the philosophy or higher criticism that impugns the most unimportant incident therein recorded. He thinks that as we are finite beings it is presumptuous for us to doubt all that we cannot understand in the mysteries of creation. He urges that we should have faith in the Bible as the inspired word of God; that preachers should preach the Gospel, and not seek to dissect and criticise. He contends that it is the duty of preachers to strengthen men's faith and not to undermine it. He objects to substituting Nature for God, the creature for the Creator. Mr. Bacon is a moral teacher and as such should be admired. He may not be a great philosopher, and perhaps he lacks a logical mind, but he is possessed of religious fervor and he is more useful to society than the agnostics who plausibly argue that if God is all he is represented to be it would be unreasonable to believe that He would damn people for following their natural inclinations. He is more useful than the popular preachers who sugar-coat their sermons for men who object to the old-fashioned system of religion and morals because it is too exacting. He preaches faith without which in the hour of mortality there is nothing but misery.

The Pension Evil

Edward Everett Hale is an advocate of the old-age pension. In discussing the subject he devotes himself to the necessity for making some provision for the aged, and to the ease with which the necessary funds could be secured. The financial part is the least important consideration, since any community could levy an arbitrary tax, and those who owned taxable property would have no choice but to pay. The necessity for providing public relief for persons over sixty-five is more apparent than real, for the majority of those who would need public relief are already in receipt of it in one form or another, either as dependents upon their relatives, as pensioners of the government, or as inmates of alms houses. A pension system is the easiest thing in the world to put in operation, but about the hardest to control, and the rate at which the demands on the United States Treasury for soldiers' pensions have increased, when there was every legitimate reason to expect a falling off, ought to make the most sanguine pause. It is naturally taken for granted that only those who cannot subsist without public relief will apply for pensions, but experience teaches that the contrary is the case, and that if people become possessed of the idea that they can get something for nothing, neither pride nor perjury will stand in the way of their making a claim. There are authenticated cases of veterans of the Civil War drawing pensions for total disability, and yet carrying on skilled occupations, and the police pension fund of San Francisco is regularly mulcted by retired officers who are earning substantial salaries in private employment or carrying on paying businesses. The proposed old age pension is fixed at one hundred dollars a year, not enough to support any one independent of other means, but quite enough to excite cupidity, and the number of men and women who would suddenly discover errors in the family record in order to come into their inheritance the sooner would be enough to upset all theories. A very good example of what people will do for the sake of a few dollars came to light a few weeks ago, when the authorities of New York decided that whenever the relatives of paupers could be found and small sums charged them for the maintenance of the aged at the public almshouse, they would be obliged to contribute according to their means. The result was that an astonishingly large number of sons and daughters suddenly discovered that they could maintain their parents at home. Pride was nothing, but parting with coin was another matter altogether. All of these advocates of old age pensions point to its success in New Zealand, but New Zealanders are less enthusiastic. They have sampled the pudding. In the first place, it is to be borne in mind that these pensions are not to be granted as a matter of course, and checks will not be mailed without publicity on the first of the month to all those who, according to the last census, have reached pension-age. It has been found in New Zealand that the class of decent poor whom it was most designed to assist are reluctant to come forward and make public the conditions of their lives, while the sturdy beggars who have the saving grace are just as hasty in presenting themselves. Moreover, New Zealand has been an experiment station in which all sorts of socialistic fads have been incubated and the load of debt under which the country is staggering is something appalling. Far-seeing statesmen do not pretend to forecast the end. It is easy enough to do a large business on borrowed capital while the day of reckoning is yet far off, but as the time for settlement draws near things assume a different aspect. Instead of holding forth the prospect of a pension as a means of lightening the cares of age, there is more reason in demanding that people should exercise a reasonable degree of prudence in laying aside something out of their earnings.

Popular Literature

One of the large Eastern publishing houses deems it worthy of special note that, contrary to the general opinion, works of fiction are not always the most popular reading, and cites two instances, "The Making of an American," Jacob I. Riis's biography, which leads the list of most often called for books in our city, while in Chicago it is displaced only by Edward Everett Hale's "Recollections of a Century." Any observer of book-sellers, or library lists, could have remarked the same "phenomenon" long ago. While in the bulk, fiction will always be read more than any other form of literature, it is always to be noted that when anything else is presented in an interesting form, which even approximates that of the common run of fiction, it wins an audience. The trouble with the average writer is that he does not know how to present his subject in a way that commands attention. He is dull, dry, or dogmatic, and nine times in ten he has nothing new to say. Take those much-quoted "Letters of a Self-Made Merchant," for example. The same sentiments have served for the headlines of copybooks since the first copybook was invented. The same ideas have been thundered from editorial columns and preached from pulpits; lecturers have lectured and teachers taught, and nice little Sunday-school books have prattled them. There was not an idea that every one was not familiar with, but when George Horace Lorimer took the old platitudes and brought them down to date and said them all over again they took a new hold. Every one read the book. Some writers, like some lecturers, have the faculty of taking hold of their audiences and making each one feel that he, personally, is the one addressed. There are comparatively few of them, but none of them has to go a-begging, nor do we hear any lamentations from them because of the tide of fiction. When writers create the impression upon the minds of their readers that they think they are writing above the heads of the crowd, and expect to be appreciated by the elect alone, it is not surprising to any one but themselves when they find themselves neglected. When they treat their subjects in a style that plainly says, "I am doing this for the price," they need not complain if the price turns out to be a small one. It is all very well to sneer at the popular demand for "interesting writing," but it is the first duty of a writer, after truth, to consider interest.

A Cunning French Lawyer

M. Waldeck-Rousseau has become the attorney for the religious associations that suffered expulsion from France, in their legal fight for the recovery of the valuable estates confiscated by the Government. The quality of honor to be found in the legal profession is the same the world over. This Waldeck-Rousseau is the same individual who, as Premier of France, inaugurated the anti-clerical legislation, which has been pushed to its logical extremity by his successor, M. Combes. The latter has done just what Waldeck-Rousseau planned and projected, and as a consequence he has been most bitterly execrated. His severest critic is none other than M. Waldeck-Rousseau, the ex-Premier. The attorneys of San Francisco are not more cunning in drumming up business than those of Paris. M. Waldeck-Rousseau has proved himself an adept in the gentle art of promoting litigation to the end that he shall be paid a fat fee. Yet he has not violated the ethics of his profession. Those ethics are very elastic. In this country attorneys become members of the legislature and then accept fees as lobbyists. Their license to practice law protects them from criminal prosecution.

The Lionizing of Jack

The American sailor has been having a very fine time abroad. Never before were the officers and men of the American navy so enthusiastically lionized, feted and toasted as have been those of Admiral Cotton's fleet. At Kiel the Kaiser did everything but embrace the man behind the gun, so cordial was he and so eager to testify his friendship for America and Americans. He dipped the Imperial Ensign, he flew the American flag and he invited the American officers to Prince Henry's luncheon in undress uniform, as though they were all cronies of the royal family. But since reaching England the representatives of our navy have been overwhelmed by the warmth of their reception and the whole-souled hospitality of their entertainment. Dinners, luncheons and banquets followed in rapid succession, and Jack had not only all he could eat and drink, but the glad-hand was extended to him on all sides and he was given all sorts of amusements. The speeches made by guest and host abound with expressions of good will, and it looks very much as though the English were intent on making the German demonstrations in honor of the Yankees seem tame. Of course we all understand that it is the policy of both Germany and England to cultivate the friendship of the United States but we are susceptible to foreign flatteries and we enjoy a hearty welcome.

The Cleveland Boom

Editor Town Talk.

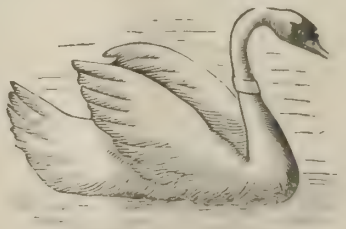
All of the Republican press of the East, aided and abetted by the subsidized, trust-supported, Democratic papers, are now actively engaged in selecting the next Democratic candidate for President of the United States, and it is a significant fact that these president making journals have seemingly united. Thoughtful people, Republicans as well as Democrats, who are not on the "inside," as it were, are wondering why the Republican papers should devote so much of their valuable space in launching a successful Cleveland boom. Speaking from a Democratic standpoint, and as an old-line Democrat, who was always loyal to Democratic candidates and Democratic platforms, so loyal indeed that he canvassed the State for Greeley and Brown, I desire to say for myself, and those who think as I do, that this cunningly devised scheme will not prove a success. Mr. Cleveland at one time represented the masses of the Democratic party, because he was loyal to the Constitution, and faithful to the principles laid down by the immortal Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence. In an evil hour for Cleveland he abandoned the principles he had formerly espoused, and became the associate and mouthpiece of the money kings of Wall street, and in order to fill a depleted treasury, sold to Pierpont Morgan and his associates United States bonds in bulk, and by this sale the genial Mr. Morgan and his associates were enabled to clear, without risk to themselves, several million dollars. This financial transaction was conducted and carried through by Mr. John G. Carlisle, formerly Speaker of the House, but then Secretary of the Treasury. When another sale of the bond issue was made necessary, the indignant demand of the people of small means, who were seeking a safe investment, compelled Mr. Carlisle to permit them to bid also, with the result that the Government made large profits. Morgan and his associates were highly indignant that any of the people, save those whom he represented, should be permitted to purchase government securities, and Mr. Carlisle felt so much aggrieved at the failure of the people to approve his financial schemes that he left his beloved state of Kentucky, moved to the city of New York, and at once became a partner in a New York law firm which receives large salaries from various corporations and trusts. Thus was disloyalty to Democratic principles rewarded by the money power of New York. Mr. Daniel Lamont, formerly Cleveland's private secretary and afterwards his Secretary of War, likewise disgusted with the treatment of his chief, Mr. Cleveland, and Carlisle his friend, also settled in the city of New York and accepted the presidency of a big railroad corporation. Even Mr. Cleveland himself became a member of a New York law firm, in order that he might keep the wolf from the door.



The same people who are now lauding Grover Cleveland to the skies as the greatest living exponent of Democracy, were then derisively calling him the "Stuffed Prophet," whatever that may mean. Gentlemen of the president-making press, what has come over the spirit of your dreams? Has the "Stuffed Prophet" become an ideal statesman, or is all your laudation simply because Mr. Cleveland has ceased to be a Jeffersonian Democrat and become the golden calf of Wall street?

John T. Altgeld, that much-abused and misunderstood statesman, whose history reads like a romance, placed an estimate upon the character and public services of Grover Cleveland, which whilst rather severe, is approved by millions of Democratic voters who followed the gallant Democratic standard-bearer, William Jennings Bryan, to defeat, brought about largely by the treachery and apathy of such so-called Democrats as Grover Cleveland, Senator Palmer and Simon Bolivar Buckner. In reply to a request to be present at a so-called Jeffersonian banquet, given by a prominent Democratic club in Chicago in 1896, Governor Altgeld politely refused and wrote as follows:

"Last summer one of the great newspapers gave an account of the greatest timber stealing and homestead robbing operations ever carried on in the Northwest, involving even the prostitution of high office. Recently the country was alarmed at seeing in Washington the most powerful and the most corrupt lobby ever known, engaged in trying to force the railroad pooling bill through Congress. I notice that two of the men whose names were most prominent in connection with one or the other of these scandals have been selected to point out the beauties of Clevelandism, and I will admit that they are the right men for the purpose. Coupled with these is at least one other whose fame in the East is co-extensive only with his ability to injure his party. These three are to discuss the great questions now before the country. All three stand for Clevelandism but not for the Democracy of the country. They stand in practice for the theory that government is a convenience for the strong, and were it Hamilton's birthday you wished to celebrate, this would all be in accordance with the eternal fitness of things. But not even a resolution of Congress, supported by a speech from a Senator and an opinion of the Attorney-General and backed by the Federal army, can keep Thomas Jefferson's bones still while you attempt to dump this program into his cradle. These men represent a class which in his day called Jefferson a demagogue, derided his statesmanship and sneered at his patriotism. Jeffersonianism was the first-born of the new age of liberty and human progress, while Clevelandism is the slimy offspring of that unhallowed marriage between the Standard Oil and Wall street. Jeffersonianism brought liberty, prosperity and greatness to our country because it gave its benediction to the great toiling and producing masses, while Clevelandism has put its heel upon the neck of our people, has increased the burdens and sorrows of the men who toil, and has fattened a horde of vultures that are eating the vitals of the nation. . . . Jefferson's eye took in the situation from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Cleveland is today ignorant of the fact that there is a country west of the Alleghenies. Jefferson belonged to the American people; Cleveland to the men who devour widows' houses. Jeffersonianism is an illumination in the American firmament; Clevelandism merely a swamp-light floating around in the Standard Oil marsh. To laud Clevelandism on Jefferson's birthday is to sing a Te Deum in honor of Judas Iscariot on a Christmas morning."

This is strong language, but it expresses a sentiment that is possibly dormant, but not dead. Let the Democratic Convention nominate Cleveland, and it will meet the most overwhelming defeat in its history. Sentiments such as are above indicated do not find a place in Cleveland newspapers, but they are nevertheless entertained by millions of Democratic voters. The great body of Democratic voters are not yet willing to turn over their party organization to those who have betrayed it in the past, and are now anxious to join with Republicans in defeating it in the future. The mass of Democratic voters are honest, earnest and patriotic; they believe in the principles of Democracy and are prepared to fight to the bitter end traitors in the organization, or open foes from without. The Cleveland boom will "die a-borning," and the gold of Wall street will be powerless to give it life.

The Crowning Charm

It is because the truth is on thy lips
That thou art dear to me.
Thy candour and thy confidence eclipse
All other charms in thee.
Though thou art crowned with grace and beauty, dear,
A better boon is thine:—
A heart that held no false or faltering fear
When it confessed to mine.

I learn from thee the courage that can cast
A scrutinizing beam
Upon the sombre spectres of the past,
Till like a dismal dream
They fade away and in their caverns cower
Before my fearless gaze;
Yea, love hath given unto me the power
To laugh at other days.

It is no wonder then that on thy breast
I find the longed-for goal,
Which through a waste of years hath been the quest
Of an o'er-wearied soul.
But I have reached at last the oasis
I dreamed of in my youth,
And drink the passion of thy peerless kiss—
The sweeter for its truth.

LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

The Saunterer

The Governor's Revenge

The impression is becoming widespread among politicians that Governor George C. Pardee is of a very revengeful nature, and that he devotes considerable of his time to planning for the punishment of his enemies. Immediately after taking office he laid in wait for the official scalp of Bank Commissioner Kevane, and to get it he encouraged the passage of an act to wipe out the whole commission. That was as discreditable a piece of business as ever the Chief Executive of a great State engaged in, but it was characteristic of Oakland politics. Last week the Governor attended a meeting of the trustees of the San Jose Normal School, and the salary of one of the teachers, Miss McKenzie, was reduced from sixteen hundred to twelve hundred dollars a year. It was explained that the trustees wished to economize, but as Miss McKenzie is the sister of Harbor Commissioner McKenzie who was identified with the Gage faction in politics, the opinion is prevalent in political circles that it was merely another case of Dr. Pardee wreaking one of his little private revenges. Miss McKenzie is said to be one of the most competent and zealous teachers in the Normal School, and her friends are very indignant over the way she has been treated. But it is surely placing a very low estimate on the character of the Governor to suspect him of smashing McKenzie through his sister. However, when he engaged in the bank commission deal he invited suspicion on his motives in all his subsequent official acts.

Lane After a Federal Job

Mr. Franklin K. Lane is the subject of much speculation among politicians these days. By affecting a coyness and a becoming humility while his claquers are diligently engaged in making a noise to attract attention to him, he makes it appear that so great is the magnetism of his personality that the people will not permit of his sequestration. He has said that he will not run for Mayor, but his claque insists that he shall; that he owes it to his party to win a victory for the organization, and that he must bow in humble submission to the wishes of the people. It is the old story of Cæsar thrusting aside the proffered crown. Now the fact is that Mr. Lane prefers another job, but as he isn't quite sure that he is going to get it he doesn't wish to protest too hard against being nominated for Mayor. At the same time he thinks he can help his friend McNab at the primaries by continuing as a factor in the Mayoralty race. The position that Lane seeks is that of Interstate Commerce Commissioner. It will be remembered that during the gubernatorial contest Lane went through the State booming Roosevelt. It was most unusual for a Democratic standard-bearer to devote himself to the laudation of the Republican Administration but Mr. Lane had an eye to his own future. When the campaign was over he went to Washington, called on the President, and presented him with a scrap-book containing his campaign speeches. When the President visited this city Lane dogged his footsteps, and now it has leaked out that the City Attorney expects the Federal job. I have been told that Roosevelt has been advised that Lane can render him valuable assistance in the next campaign. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a non-partisan body, and there is therefore no political obstacle in the way of Lane's appointment.

The Man of Destiny

Some people believe that Lane, like Roosevelt, is a man of destiny, and to reflect upon his meteoric career and ponder the fortuitous circumstances that have pedestaled him in the community today, is to impel the conviction that his horoscope was not planned without deliberation. If Lane had been elected Governor his career would have been at an end, for he never could have kept all the promises he made during the campaign. Though defeated he acquired the reputation of being the strongest available candidate for Mayor in the Democratic party. This notion is based upon the fact that his majority in this city was about ten thousand. The fact appears to be forgotten that he was running against a citizen of Alameda, a man with the nickname of Pickhandle, so designated because he once threatened to drive back a mob with that implement. So bitter was the feeling in union labor circles against the man whom they regarded as their enemy that they rotten-egged him at one of their meetings, and yet Lane's majority in this city was only ten thousand.

His Blundering Record

None but a man of destiny could make a holy show of himself as a public official after the manner of Franklin K. Lane, and yet be nominated for Governor, and after being defeated be taken seriously as one of the most available men for high public office. As City and County Attorney Mr. Lane has made a resplendent record for blundering that is unsurpassed in the history of the office. It was Mr. Lane who formulated the bonds issued for the extension of the Park panhandle, and who dictated all the proceedings in connection with that pet project. The Supreme Court decided that his blunders vitiated the issue, and as a consequence that great municipal project was abandoned. It was Mr. Lane who handled the Spring Valley water case which was decided against the city by Judge Morrow the other day. Mr. Lane has a happy faculty for reversing himself, and he does his official somersaulting without a blush. He rendered two opinions diametrically opposed in the case of Lieutenant Price who demanded reinstatement in the Police Department; he did the same thing in the matter of the contract for public printing, and again in the matter of the authority of the Supervisors to require the union label on all official stationery. But for a long time Mr. Lane has ceased to write opinions. He has assigned that work to his brother who is said to know something about law.

They Regret Their Bargain

When the arbitration proceedings resorted to for the purpose of settling the differences between the car men and the United Railroads company were commenced, it was stated that the issue involved was of tremendous importance to street railroads all over the country. It was understood to be the intention of Mr. Livernash to convince the arbitrators that the car men were entitled to share in the profits of the railroads. The Congressman has abandoned his original position, however, and the importance attached to the contest at the beginning has greatly diminished. However there have been some sensational rumors afloat to the effect that the reluctance of the corporation officials to produce their books is due to the fact that they have been having a hard time to float their stock. It is said that the Eastern capitalists have reason to regret their bargain, and it is predicted that before long Huntington and Hellman will regain possession of the roads for a sum much less than was paid for them.

The Greatest of Engineering Triumphs

From one of the engineers of the Southern Pacific Company I learn that the greatest engineering triumph in the history of railroad construction, the building of the now famous Lucin cut-off across the treacherous bed of Great Salt Lake, is rapidly nearing completion. This is one of the great improvements projected by President E. H. Harriman, which have aroused the indignation of Jim Keene and other stockholders of the Southern Pacific Company, who objected to the spending of money which they thought should be paid to them in dividends. The loss of the stockholders is the gain of the traveling public, and it should be especially appreciated by the people of this coast. The one hundred and six miles of railroad over which this cut-off extends are being built at an estimated cost of thirteen million dollars, and as success is now crowning this most wonderful and by far the most daring piece of railroad engineering ever attempted, we are assured that within another six months the actual running time between Ogden and this city will be reduced by more than two hours. The heavy passenger trains that now spend more than four hours covering the one hundred and forty-six miles of mountainous road around the north end of the lake from Ogden to Lucin will reach the same destination over a railroad which is laid straight across the lake forty miles shorter and almost level.

Harriman Ordered Secrecy

Comparatively little has been published concerning this stupendous piece of work. The Southern Pacific did not want the world to know what it was doing, and has taken every precaution to prevent the press from publishing anything concerning the work. The reason for the secrecy was that uncertainty as to the ultimate result of the daring undertaking has existed in the minds of even the most sanguine engineers. Had it any time become necessary to abandon the project, the loss to the stockholders of the company would have been great. As it was many of the stockholders were greatly dissatisfied, and Mr. Harriman issued orders to keep all newspaper men off the work, and prohibited the issuance of information. From time to time reports did get into the papers to the effect that the undertaking was a failure and would be abandoned. But Harriman's three thousand workmen and hundreds of thousands of piles have conquered the mysterious lake and the one great sinkhole known as the bottomless pit was overcome by dumping a mountain of rock into it.

A Wise Jap

George Pippy, president of the Union League Club, and one of the numerous colonels of that organization, is a man of varied interests. He is a politician, a lawyer and a dairyman in addition to being a professional colonel. That he has confidence in the character of his cows is evident from the fact that he supplies their milk to his own family. But he recently hired a Japanese chef who thinks that he knows good milk from the kind that is objected to by the Board of Health. The other morning Mrs. Pippy handed her husband a note which had been given her by the milkman who said he received it from the Jap. It was as follows: "Unless you give me more milk and less water, we get new milkman." Pippy hasn't told the story for general circulation.

The Danger of It

Few business men know how to take their vacations properly. At the Bohemian Club the other day one of the medico members gave voice to the following warning: "I wish some of you who try to get your year's rest in a fortnight's outing would stop and think a bit. Not a year passes that this season does not bring its quota of victims. Many men, enfeebled by close confinement and attention to office work, rush away for a short vacation trip. By systematic overexertion they try to make up for months of inactivity. Qui bono? The warning lies in each year's record of fatalities. The experience of myself and colleagues shows that this overexertion is nearly always succeeded by a spell of serious illness. You must remember that the respiratory and circulatory systems run hand-in-hand; against undue disturbance of their routine they naturally rebel. Take heed to this—your greatest danger is when, in the presence of any cardiac weakness, the exertion demands an arrest of respiration. In moments of intense nervous excitement, the breathing often stops and the strain upon a weak heart becomes extremely severe."

The Boot-Black King

It was stated in the despatches the other day that at the annual Haggin sale of young Kentucky thoroughbreds, Tony Aste bid William C. Whitney's English son-in-law, Sidney Paget and S. Deimel off their feet. He wanted a promising brown colt and he ran the price up to seventy-one hundred dollars, which was the top price of the day. Tony Aste was formerly a resident of this city. He blacked boots for a living in Leidesdorff street. He is now known in New York as the boot-black king. He saved enough money blacking boots in New York to buy privileges to erect boot-black stands in most of the sky-scrapers, from which he has made a fortune estimated to be close to half a million. He is a good judge of horses and has acquired a fine stable. During the past year he has put more long-shots under the wire as winners than any other man in the racing game.

From Waikiki to Broadway

One of the most interesting of the thespians that have deserted Broadway to while away the summer months in this city is William Lewers, who came to town a few weeks ago. The stage has recruited many actresses from society, but it is seldom that men in the full enjoyment of the social whirl take to the histrionic profession. Those that do, like the society women that are lured by the footlights' glare, are impelled by the bread-winning motive, but William Lewers was not influenced by materialistic considerations. He is the son of Robert Lewers, the millionaire shipping merchant of Honolulu, and he enjoys the approval of his father in all that he does, for he is a sensible and cultured young man. He is of the artistic temperament, and he felt that the stage offered the most suitable vehicle for his talents. That he was not mistaken is evident from the rapid progress he has made during the few years that have elapsed since he made his debut in this city with the Frawleys. That was in the days when Blanche Bates and Frank Worthing were the stars of the organization. During the last few seasons he was one of the most popular of Frohman's leading juveniles. He made a most pronounced hit in the support of Annie Russell, and next season he is to essay the role of leading man with Bertha Galland in "Dorothy Vernon." Though Miss Galland is comparatively unknown to local theatre-goers she is one of the reigning Broadway favorites. Mr. Lewers is a prominent member of the Lambs' Club of New York and of the Bohemian Club, in which he has spent a great deal of his time since his return to this city. He is at the Occidental with his father. The Lewers residence at Waikiki beach in Honolulu is one of the most beautiful homes in the Hawaiian Islands.

der in a small town about thirty miles distant from the one in which his office was located. He was promised a big fee, and he agreed to make the trip over to see his clients the next day, for the cases had already been set for trial. Accordingly he started out the following morning and journeyed over the mountainous roads. He entered the town over a bridge that spanned a small creek, and as he was driving over he was shocked to find that three dead bodies were suspended over one side. Upon inquiry he learned that the citizens of the town had decided to spare the county the expense of a trial and so they executed his clients.

Henley's Just Protest

In their obituary notice of William Ernest Henley, last Monday, the dailies stated that he was universally condemned for having exposed the character of his dead friend, Robert Louis Stevenson. He was for a time, but not for long. Henley was a sincere friend of Stevenson, and he was thoroughly disgusted with the sentimental distortion of the character of the dead stylist, with the apotheosizing of the man who was sufficiently great without being pictured as Saint. Henley pleaded for the real Stevenson whom he knew, and his protest soon made it apparent that the novelist was the greater for the weaknesses his former friend had pointed out. The Saturday Review characterized his protest as a case of "literary leprosy," but now it is conceded to be a useful contribution to the literature of biography. The office of the biographer is a thankless one. Unless every fact that would be in the slightest degree derogatory to the popular idol, or likely to offend his idolatrous worshipers, is suppressed; unless the writer is lavish in his praise and takes such an optimistic, couleur de rose view of everything affecting the little tin god, he will not be considered a true or a discreet biographer.

Fulfilled the Soothsayers' Predictions

It is not likely that one person in society was surprised when it learned of Kathryn Robinson's engagement to a wealthy New Yorker. When Miss Robinson made her debut it was predicted that she would make a good match. This, too, with only the milkmaid's dot of the famous nursery rhyme. Mrs. Crittenden Preston Robinson was not able to give either of her daughters a dot. Compelled by adverse circumstance to support her children herself, she did not shrink from the task but with the real Southern grit carried out the duties imposed upon her in a most noble manner. When her girls became of age to go out into the world their aunts, Mrs. John R. Jarboe and Mrs. Monroe Salisbury, were very willing to give them a lift. It was two years ago that Kathryn entered society, and her beauty, charm and wit at once made her popular. The man who has won this charming girl is to be congratulated. He is George R. Beardsley of New York.

A Salisbury Triumph

Whatever Mrs. Salisbury's faults as a writer of society gossip she is certainly far above the average as a matchmaker. The engagement of her niece, Miss Robinson, and Mr. Beardsley is said to be another one of her triumphs. She is what might be known as an "old campaigner," for her experience in such affairs is broad. But if Sarah Collier doesn't marry soon Mrs. Salisbury's reputation as a matchmaker will be seriously damaged. When the Czarina took that young lady under her wing it was predicted that the campaign would be short and decisive. But it is still on. Miss Collier is an exceptionally attractive girl and I hear that the only reason she fails to marry is that she is hard to please. Now that Mrs. Salisbury's daughter and her niece are out of the field there no longer remains an excuse for her to stay in society except that, like Mrs. Martin, she loves the game. There is no doubt that she will renew her excuse in the shape of another debutante to be favored by Cupid next season.

Hearst's Washington Quarters

Congressman Hearst, who will make his debut next season in national legislative circles, is reported to have engaged nearly an entire floor in "Stoneleigh Court." "Stoneleigh Court" is the new swell apartment house now being constructed in Washington by Secretary of State Hay and will be ready for occupancy some time in December. It is built on mammoth proportions and is located right among the fashionable residences in the District. It is said that Editor Hearst has turned the plans over to well known designers and furnishers and has given them carte blanche to produce the most beautiful private apartments in the Capital. This is all in line with the rumor that prevailed immediately after his election, that he planned to entertain on a grand scale when he took up his quarters in Washington.

An Engagement Renewed

There's an interesting bit of news afloat anent the impending trip abroad of Mrs. Head, widow of Colonel A. E. Head, and her daughter, Anna. The story appears to be well authenticated that the engagement of Miss Head and Lieutenant Jepson has been renewed, and that the Heads are going abroad for the marriage, which will probably take place in London. It will be remembered that some years ago the news of that engagement created quite a flutter in some of the fashionable drawing rooms, and Anna Head was heartily congratulated on having made a brilliant match, for though Jepson is not wealthy he is the scion of a blue-blooded English family. Besides he is no dawdler. He was a member of the relief expedition sent to darkest Africa in search of Explorer Stanley, and on his return he wrote a very entertaining book of his travels. He also took to the lecture platform and he appeared in this city before the Geographical Society. Some years ago he was honored by being appointed Queen's Messenger.

The Crystal Baths

Story of the Romance

Anna Head met her fiancee while she was traveling in Europe. The passion that he inspired was of a most ardent character, and it appeared to be sincerely reciprocated, but after a protracted engagement the news reached this city that it was broken off. The news stimulated teacup chatter, and there was much speculation as to the cause of the rupture. But as society was not taken into the confidence of the young people the gossips had to be content with mere rumor, and of course all the conjectures usual in such cases were indulged. There was much sympathy for Anna Head over the unfortunate ending of her romance, for she was a popular girl and had a host of friends. The story of the renewal of the engagement arouses interest once more, and there is much rejoicing among Anna Head's friends that whatever the misunderstanding that separated her so long from the object of her affections they are to be reunited just like the hero and heroine in the last chapter of a Duchess novel.

The Hearsts and Heads Fell Out

Anna Head is the daughter of Colonel A. E. Head who was for many years engaged in the cattle business in Arizona and Mexico with Hearst and Haggin. The Hearst and the Head families were for a long time on most intimate terms. But one night, so the story goes, a very swagger function took place at the Head home and Willie Hearst was not invited. The oversight didn't bother Willie but some days later "Uncle" George Hearst heard the reason why, and he became very indignant. Thereupon the cordial relations existing between the two families were severed. Some years ago Colonel Head suffered financial reverses but he left one or two pieces of down town property that have greatly increased in value. His widow is now quite wealthy.

A Sculptor's Sad Plight

F. Marion Wells, the sculptor, occupies a pauper's bed in the County Hospital, and his wife complains that the members of the Bohemian Club heeded not her appeals for aid in his behalf. Wells has been in financial straits for many years, and I have been told that he frequently received generous assistance from the Bohemian Club. However the club is not an eleemosynary institution, nor does it guarantee subsistence or financial aid to those of its members who are so unfortunate as to become indigent. It would have been a graceful act for the club to have come to the relief of the unfortunate sculptor but there are two sides to a story. There was a time when Wells was regarded as one of the great geniuses of Bohemia, and twenty years ago he was one of the Board of Directors. Some beautiful bits of sculpture were contributed by him from time to time, to the collection of jinks souvenirs. On one occasion when Crittenden Thornton sired a "Gossip" jinks Wells modeled an exquisite figure of women gossiping at a well. Another time, at a midsummer jinks in Meeker's Grove, Wells, aided by some of the other artist members, erected a huge statue of the patron saint of Bohemia, St. John Nepomuck. Perhaps the most exquisite thing he ever did was at a jinks when "Muses" was the theme. His work was the sculptured figure of a woman, physically perfect, and when it was shown placed against red draperies, a roseate light was thrown upon it making it almost lifelike.

Mrs. M. G. Bulkeley and M. G. Bulkeley Jr. arrived at the Hotel Vendome the other day, hastily summoned from Hartford, Connecticut, by the serious illness of Mrs. J. F. Houghton. Considerable alarm was created by Mrs. Houghton's illness, and fears as to her recovery expressed, but at last accounts she was much improved. Miss Minnie Houghton has her friend Miss Sparhawk with her from San Francisco.

The Busy Chaperon

Blanche Bates is enjoying the hospitality of Dick Hotaling at Sleepy Hollow where he has been entertaining a house-party, and she is under the protecting wing of a chaperon. Which reminds me that the chaperon is becoming a very much overworked functionary. She was originally intended as a guardian in public places for young, unmarried women, but now she is ostentatiously paraded by women who have arrived at the age of indiscretion and who haven't the courage to refuse concession to the conventions. Some years ago it was argued by European sociologists that the refreshing independence of spirit which characterized American women was due to the freedom they enjoyed, and to the fact that our girls were vouchsafed liberties that were denied their sisters of the Old World. That was before the chaperon became a silly affectation among women who desire to give notice to the world that they are taking no chances. Even the woman with a past goes chaperoned on certain occasions, and usually when she does it is because she contemplates doing things of which she desires people to believe her guiltless.

Emancipation Far Distant

If a chaperon were an absolute guarantee of a clean bill of moral health at all times, she would occasionally be indispensable, for there are times when it behooves young women to silence criticism. However, the presence of a chaperon isn't always prima facie evidence of strict observance of the proprieties. There are times when she is expected to be discreetly oblivious, and occasionally when a woman feels that the conventions demand a chaperon, it doesn't matter much whether she has one or not. The affectation has been so greatly abused that nobody takes the overworked functionary seriously, and she excites suspicion as often as she inspires respect. I long for the time when woman's emancipation will be so complete that she will scorn to summon the world to witness that she has taken precautions to safeguard her virtue. But when I hear of women noted for their intellectual attainments, women who have achieved fame by doing things that denote their ability to take care of themselves, confessing that they are slaves to tyrannous conventionality, I lose confidence in the sex. Indeed it seems as though the sex is drifting backward, for even the bright women of the stage are becoming as conventional as those of society, a natural consequence of the stage's contamination through fostering cordial relations between the stars of the theatrical firmament and the lion worshipers of the smart set.

In Town and Country

The new home of the Frank Deerings is rapidly approaching completion, and it will be one of the prettiest houses on Russian Hill. It is in Larkin street, on the northwestern slope of the hill. Dolliver, who designed it from suggestions furnished by Mrs. Deering, has put some of his best work into its architecture. The Deerings, by the way, have been visiting the H. K. Fields at their summer camp on the Russian River. The Fields' camp consists of several tents, furnished with rare comfort. They always take two servants up with them, and one of them is a chef. They are seldom without guests; from Saturday to Monday there are sometimes as many as twenty entertained at the camp.

BORJES & BENSON, 1001 Market Street, corner of Sixth, carry none but the Finest Imported and Domestic Wines and Liquors. Polite treatment, quick service, fine goods and popular prices have made this house one of the favorite resorts of the city.

The Versatile Davis

The ex-Reverend Edwards Davis, who wearied of acting in the pulpit and became a real footlight mummer, and who is now in the Macdonough theatre in Oakland, has a wonderful faculty for keeping himself in the public eye. If he were as good a drawing card on the stage as he was in the pulpit, his season at the Macdonough would be a most successful one. As a clergyman he was skilled in the art of advertising. He was always doing something to attract attention to himself. He rode a wheel before bicycling became common, he wore a claw-hammer into the pulpit, and he waltzed for his congregation. His sensational stunts shocked many of the good people of Oakland. One day he married Alta Kingore who sang in his church choir, and they went East, Davis having resigned his pulpit. In New York the ex-clergyman invented a drawing-room game that sold well and kept the wolf from the door. Then he fell ill and went to a hospital and his wife went on the stage. Later on Mrs. Davis returned to Oakland and engaged an attorney to sue for a divorce, but she relented and when next heard from husband and wife were doing profitable turns on a vaudeville circuit. I hear that Davis has written a novel which has been accepted by an Eastern publishing house.

Captain John Leale and family are spending the season at Inverness, where they have a summer home. Captain Leale's eldest daughter, Marion, is almost of age now to make her debut in society. She is very pretty and accomplished. Her mother, who was Fannie Cheney and a great social favorite in her girlhood days, is a fine pianist.

The Irwins to Leave Us

The Wallace Irwins will leave for San Diego on the first of August, and a few weeks later will depart for New York, where they expect to remain a year. Irwin, although he will take no complete manuscript with him, has considerable work in partial preparation and Mrs. Irwin has the manuscript for a children's book which is ready for the printer. "The Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum" are still having a great vogue in the East and they are not only being read, but they are being copied in one way or another by those who deal in patter literature. Among others Dorothy Dix has rendered the Hoodlum the sincerest form of flattery by using in almost every one of her slangy fables some line from the Irwin verses, which she invariably forgets to quote.

Tevis and His Hobby

Dr. Harry Tevis had, perhaps, his first opportunity on the Fourth to make public his curious fad for home-made fireworks, but the fact is, he has long been a mute, inglorious Santos-Dumont. Paper balloons are the doctor's special hobby, and he has experimented thoroughly with all sorts and conditions of levitation until he has become a past master in the art of sending things into the air. About two years ago he began making a little Aero Club of his Taylor street mansion and he played with his toy balloons with quite a childish enthusiasm. Almost every afternoon he would make miniature ascensions from his back porch till the air of North Beach was full of red, white and blue paper. About that time it was whispered that Dr. Tevis had gone abroad and become infatuated with the Santos-Dumont craze, and even his friends were sincerely expecting him to father air-ship racing on the Pacific Coast. Time, however, proved that this talk was "all in the air," for the scientific millionaire has limited his investigations to tricolored toys and Japanese day-fireworks —which is a great deal more safe and a great deal less expensive than running a midair auto after the fashion of the reckless South American.

Mrs. Thomas Morffew has returned to town from a visit to the family ranch in Sonoma county. She was accompanied by her granddaughter, Miss Peel.

Industrious Dick Tully

Dick Tully, who seems to be outrivaling Clyde Fitch in the drama mill business, has finished and disposed of another play since his "vacation" in California. He has sold the play, I am told, to Nat Goodwin, and it is to be called "The Late Mr. Archer." It is the style of human comedy which fits Goodwin like a tailor-made. Tully's experience, financially, is such as to encourage us all to write plays. He is given a thousand dollar guarantee as soon as his work is accepted, and he receives his profits on the basis of a liberal royalty. Tully, I hear, is somewhat mortified because, upon his arrival with his celebrated wife, the newspapers referred in a jocular vein to the fact that "Mrs. Tully has come and brought along her husband, Dick Tully."

Mrs. Tully's Salon

The quick success of Eleanor Gates Tully, by the way, has made her fairly crazy to be considered the centre of things literary in the West. The West, if I am not mistaken, will not be so quick to accept this state of affairs, for Mrs. Tully is young, and her book, brilliant though it be, has still many marks of the schoolgirl about it. Still, Mrs. Tully has been working strenuously to make one of those peculiarly difficult contrivances, a "salon," and she has succeeded so far in gathering about her some of the well known literary figure-heads of the West. Her evenings at home fairly bristle with magazine names and the conversation is fiercely technical. At one of her receptions recently the list of those present read like a table of contents, and some of the following were among them: Lloyd Osbourne, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Whitaker, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Bashford, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Keeler and Mr. and Mrs. Bailey Millard.

The Parrott Brood

The fact that the very domestic Jack Parrotts and the little Parrotts have gone for their annual outing at Del Monte recalls a funny nickname which was given to the Parrott brood during a season past. Mrs. Parrott was sitting on the hotel veranda surrounded, like the mother of the Gracchi, by her pretty children. "That's a fine picture," remarked a stranger. "Who is she?" "Oh," said a Del Monteite, "That's Mrs. Parrott and her nest of little Parrotts." "The little Parrotts are not very talkative," said the stranger. "No," replied the Del Monteite, "they are only paroqueets, don't you know."

Loubet's Little Joke

The despatches tell us that President Loubet presented Queen Alexandra with a musical bed that plays tunes when occupied. If so the President of France has a sense of humor that is peculiarly Parisian. It is well known that the Queen of England is deaf, consequently a musical bed for the royal lady would only serve to notify everybody in the palace whenever it was occupied.

Woolsey's Japanese Wife

News comes to me by the last steamer from the Orient that just before she left the last Japanese port, one Dr. Woolsey of Oakland, who has been traveling in the Mikado's realms ostensibly as a commissioner of this Government, appeared on the dock with a pretty Japanese girl on his arm.

"Who is your friend?" asked a man who was acquainted with the doctor.

Woolsey tickled her under the chin and proudly exclaimed:

"This, sir, is my Japanese wife."

Needless to say the old doctor, whose boundless admiration for the gentle sex is well known to all Oakland, is having a high old time in the land of the geisha.

Thought It a Hostelry

The courteous young man who receives applicants at the Waldeck was called to the reception room to speak to a young woman one day last week. The latter was comfortably seated in one of the easy-chairs, and evidently found herself very much at home.

"The head nurse is very busy," said the young man on his entrance, "but I can assign you to a room."

The young woman looked grateful.

"What is the name of your doctor?" he went on.

The young woman looked puzzled.

"Doctor? I have no doctor."

"Oh, very well, then, I will speak to the head nurse again and she will assign you."

The young woman stared.

"What is your illness?" he further asked. "You see, the head nurse is so busy, I will just tell her about it and she will know what to do."

"What is the head nurse to me?" returned the visitor. "I'm not asking for a head nurse. I don't want a nurse. I'm not ill."

"But why, then, did you come here?"

"I came because I wanted board and room," snapped the young woman. "Isn't this a hotel? The sign says so."

"No, it is a sanitarium," was the answer.

The young woman wilted and passed out

Automobiling is very popular among the guests at Del Monte. Mrs. W. P. Fuller has a fine Winton in which she made the run from Burlingame this week with Miss Florence Bailey. Mrs. J. J. Moore is the most beautiful woman at the hotel. She is there with her husband and sister, Miss Wagner. The latter, however, is not gifted with Mrs. Moore's pulchritude, though she has considerable chic. Others at Del Monte are Mrs. G. P. Hayne and family of San Mateo, Roy and Percy Pike and H. D. Bell.

Salmon Are Plentiful

Now that market fishermen are no longer permitted to cast their nets for salmon in Monterey bay, the run of salmon in those waters is unprecedented. The biggest catches have been made off Capitola and that resort is now crowded with sportsmen from this city. Fifty fish is the record catch for one man. It was made last Monday.

San Rafael's Summer Colony

San Rafael is almost gay these days. Beside the great crowd of the Inconsiderable who rent cottages and board in the many family boarding houses in the village, the hotel colony has been augmented by a few notables from town. Golfing, riding and driving, and that never-failing source of amusement in San Rafael—gossiping—are the chief diversions. The Willie Babcocks, contrary to their usual custom, have not gone abroad this year but are entertaining occasionally at dinner in an informal way. The George M. Pinckards are occupying their house in the Forbes addition, but will probably spend some time in the mountains later in the season. Their departure has been delayed by the serious illness of their son Eyre Pinckard who recently returned from Yale. The George Davis Boyds are at their beautiful home on the heights and one sees the De Youngs about frequently, especially on the road to "Sleepy Hollow." This home of Dick Hotaling is anything but sleepy. There is always a crowd cruising about in Dick's automobile, the "Asthma," a great red affair which gets its name from a diverting wheeze.

The Upper Thirteen Disappointed

When Mrs. George Herman Powers starts out to give a concert nothing can stop her. This year she decided that a new bell for the Methodist church in San Rafael should be the motif, and she was confident that she could put a large sum of money into the hands of the trustees.

ED. PINAUD'S Eau de Quinine is the best Hair Restorative known. It preserves the hair from parasitic attacks, tones up the hair bulbs, cleanses the scalp and positively removes dandruff.

ED. PINAUD'S Eau de Quinine is also a most excellent hair dressing. The sweet and refined odor which it leaves in the hair makes it a toilet luxury.

The total sum realized was thirty-five dollars. The concert caused considerable disappointment among the Upper Thirteen. They had hardly hoped to share with Mrs. M. H. de Young and Mrs. L. L. Baker the honor of being on the list of patronesses, but they did think that when Mrs. Powers was making up the program of her vaudeville show she would seek for talent among them. But many were overlooked. There was some surprise over the failure of Mrs. Douglass Hardy to appear. She has an exquisite voice, rather thin, perhaps, and lacking in cultivation and quality but peculiarly adapted for Spanish love ditties. Mrs. W. B. Bradford was expected to do an Oriental dancing stunt but she didn't. Mr. Bradford who is president of the Cosmos Club accompanies his wife on the bass viol and the effect is charming. Mrs. John E. Alexander had consented to recite an intensely dramatic and emotional thing of her own composition, and others of the Upper Thirteen expected to have opportunities to shine, but they were not needed. Mrs. Powers has an abundance of talent in her own family, and what she actually needed outside her family she imported from San Francisco. Therefore the affair was less profitable than artistic.

In San Jose

Mrs. James M. Goewey and her mother, Mrs. L. A. Spencer, are at the Vendome for the summer. Others at the hotel are Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Taylor and the Misses Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Hooker, Mr. and Mrs. William Gruenhagen. Thurlow McMullin arrived the other day, having spent two months traveling among the mountains of Northern California. Mrs. Ernest Folger of Oakland is the most daring of the women swimmers at the hotel this year.

Grant Donahue, editor of the Morning Herald of Sydney, Australia, is on a tour of California. He is at present summing up the resources of the Santa Clara valley and is the guest of Paul Shoupe at San Jose.

A New Engagement

Miss Amy Gregory, whose engagement with Oliver Blanchard of San Jose has just been announced, is a stunning looking girl, tall and brunette, and she is well-known in musical circles here and in San Jose where her parents formerly lived. The Gregorys own a big ranch near Niles, the Centerville hotel and various other real estate in Washington township. Mr. Blanchard is an official stenographer in the San Jose courts, and is one of the amateur athletes of the garden city. The marriage will take place early in August.

The Brighams at Home

Dr. Brigham's illness is a serious one, and his family and friends are naturally much concerned over his condition. The Brighams have been prominent in society for many years, and their branch of Society is that of the most exclusive. They despise the new-rich and keep strictly within aristocratic lines. The Brigham home is the most picturesque of the pretty residences on Pacific Heights, and was one of the first of its kind on the hill. It is situated in Broadway and overlooks the bay and the Golden Gate. A huge hedge screens the house from the eyes of vulgar passers-by. There is a beautiful garden in front and rear of the house, flowers being one of Dr. Brigham's fads. There are two Brigham girls in society, Alice and Kate.

Gambling at the Seaside

Santa Cruz is not depending altogether on brass bands to lure the summer visitor. The little seashore town of holy name is wide-open these midsummer days, and the flow of coin into the pockets of the residents is stimulated by various gambling devices. The tiger is rampant and a roulette wheel is operated in the rear of the St. George hotel. A sensational story has been in circulation to the effect that a retired banker of the seaside city went against the game with his I. O. U.s for a large sum of money and now refuses to pay. He asserts that he was lured into the game while flushed with wine.

Robert Shaw Oliver, the new Assistant Secretary of War appointed a few days ago, is the scion of an old Boston family, but he has lived for years in Albany where he became an intimate friend of President Roosevelt during the latter's term as Governor of New York. He married in Boston a Miss Rathbone, daughter of General Rathbone and a cousin of Major Rathbone of this city. He served as a volunteer in the civil war and of late years he has been prominently identified with the National Guard of New York.

Society is looking forward with considerable interest to the revival of the polo pony races and games at Del Monte under the auspices of the association founded some years ago by Major Rathbone. Preparation for the event is now in progress and it is believed that many of those who participated in the Santa Barbara tournament will come to Del Monte. Among them is Tom Driscoll who has required a great deal of coaxing ever since he had a row with Walter Hobart. Driscoll is one of the best polo men in the State.

The Honesty of the McDonalds

R. H. McDonald Jr. says that his father, Dr. R. H. McDonald, formerly president of the Pacific Bank, who died in Montreal the other day, was an honest man. That is probably more than the old man would say for himself in the last years of his life. The conviction of his honesty was not strong enough to hold him in this city after the collapse of the Pacific and Mutual Savings banks, for the veteran purveyor of vinegar bitters and hypocritical nonsense didn't stay to be tried, as one of the dailies reported. He ran away from town and never dared return. People familiar with the affairs of the Pacific Bank at the time of the collapse, and who recall the fact that money had been loaned in large sums without security to people whose duty it was to expose the rottenness of the concern long before the crash came, cannot be easily convinced that the McDonalds were honest men.

Young Rosenstirn a Marvel

Dr. Rosenstirn has a son who is such a marvel of recuperative power that he would make a good advertisement for some patent restorative. The young man has had more accidents and operations, to say nothing of hairbreadth escapes, than usually falls to the lot of a dozen mortals, but he goes on his way rejoicing with only the slightest inconvenience. Not only has he been deprived of his appendix but he recovered from the operation in about half of the time consumed by the average patient. Shortly after he was spilled out of an automobile with disastrous consequences and, after abjuring automobiles, he was tipped over in a stage this summer and rolled down an embankment. Like Jack, he cracked his crown and the fracture to the skull was of such a nature that for awhile after going into the hospital he was flighty. This, however, passed almost immediately and in a week he was out on the street again, to the utter amazement of his friends. The Spartan endurance of the boy runs in the family. Miss Emily Rosenstirn, his sister, shot herself accidentally in camp some summers ago while at target practice, and after the accident walked calmly into camp with the blood spurting through her white skirt. It was Miss Rosenstirn who, some time ago, gave the appendix dinner to a number of friends who had lost this interesting appendage. The dinner and its gruesome decorations of surgical appliances occasioned much talk, most of it of an unpleasant nature. A New York paper took it up and drew from it conclusions as to the degeneracy of San Francisco society.

"Coming Out" Ball Promised

The two De Guigne girls have changed their plans regarding their debut in society. Last year at a family conference it was gravely determined that the time had arrived to depart from the old-fashioned lines of introducing the family buds to the charmed circle, so bids were offered to the bright wits present to suggest some novelty to the conventional function. It happened that several months before two cousins of the De Guignes, the daughters of Colonel Dick, had made their debut in English society at a garden party given by King Edward. This happy idea hit the fancy of the assembled family and forthwith it was decided to launch the two buds at a beautiful garden party some time during the present year. As I said before that idea has now been tabled and it has been finally settled that they shall have their "coming out" at a big ball to be given during the coming winter. The two girls are of the "really, truly" Parrott stock, their mother being one of the direct daughters of that social line.

Brave John Nugent

The recent marriage of Miss Maude Beatrice Nugent serves to recall to many of our early residents the stirring events of the '50 decade. The bride's progenitor, John Nugent, was then the editor of the San Francisco Herald, the chief organ of the Democracy during the troublous times of the Vigilance Committee, when the Democrats were "law and order" almost to a man. Nugent was as fearless an opponent of the committee as he was a staunch supporter of the Democratic ticket, and did good service for his party as president of the Young Man's Democratic Club during the election of President James Buchanan. Though small, almost diminutive in stature, he was a giant in intellect and a lion in courage, as was evidenced by the duels he fought. He married one of the Estudillos and then retired from public life and became a ranchero in Alameda county.

Sympathy for Professor Soule

Considerable sympathy is expressed for Professor Soule of Berkeley who is suing his wife, Ella Bacon-Soule, for a reduction in the amount of alimony she is receiving. Professor Soule's complaint is interesting. In it he says that he receives but two hundred and seventy-five dollars a month, of which he is obliged by the terms of the divorce decree to pay her seventy-five dollars. This was originally planned for the support of the two sons of the marriage—the daughter died some years ago—but one of the sons is now married and the father of two sons of his own, and is not only earning a good living but is married to a wealthy woman. The other son resides with his mother. The

ITS SCOPE ENLARGED.

When that pretty, unique restaurant at 323 Larkin street sprang into being no one could have foretold how soon it would catch on with the eating public. But Bab's took right away, and leaped into high favor. This popularity is due not solely to the original scheme of furnishing that prevails throughout this epicurean place, but because of the undoubted excellence of its menus. The James H. Babcock Catering Company has now enlarged its scope and will serve dejeuners, luncheons, dinners and suppers for formal occasions in private houses and clubs. Mr. Babcock's experience in this line—he was formerly with Sherry in New York—enables him to cater to all tastes satisfactorily. Fine silverware from New York and beautiful crockery from Europe are features of the establishment at 409 Golden Gate avenue.

Professor goes on to say that he is purchasing a home on the installment plan. It cost but forty-five hundred dollars and he pays seventy-five dollars a month on the purchase price. This leaves him but one hundred and twenty-five dollars upon which to live and he has married again since he parted from the original partner of his sorrows.

The Pedagogue's Wail

The professor says that he has not enough to live on and to dress as he should in his position, and by the way the professor is fond of dress, for he has always had a predilection for giving the ladies a treat. It is sad to hear the once gay gallant of Berkeley wail over his financial distress. He complains that he has nothing left out of his salary for a rainy day, and he asserts that he is past the prime of life. He also complains that he cannot afford to subscribe for the periodicals which he should have in order to keep up with his profession. He makes no reference, however, to the ten thousand dollar legacy which came to him from his father's estate, but he calls attention to the fact that Mrs. Bacon-Soule is a wealthy woman, having inherited half a million from her father and mother. She is now building a twenty thousand dollar residence in the Piedmont district in Oakland which she is furnishing at a cost of ten thousand. The professor's friends say that he is deserving of sympathy because his first wife was never well and cheerful. His second wife is the antithesis of his first, being big, buxom and hearty. When he started in search of a mate a second time he looked first of all for a woman without an ache or a pain and now he is happy with his Hebe.

University Gates Closed

Both the State University and the Palo Alto University are going through a singular legal ceremony just now. All the roads and paths leading to their grounds are carefully barred and all the gates locked and safely chained. Big placards bearing the word "Closed" are conspicuously posted. At the main entrance men are stationed to unchain the gate and allow only those to enter who have business on the premises. At Palo Alto this is not causing any extravagant inconvenience but at the University of California it caused some mutterings at first because the biggest "summer school" on record is now being held there and most of the students, being strangers, thought for a time that the authorities were trying to bar the attendance. They were relieved later on when arrangements were made whereby they could more easily go in and out by the main gateway. It was also explained to them that the same gate-closing ceremony had to be done every five years according to the letter of the law by the university authorities so as to hold the franchise.

Book Thieves at Berkeley

From the last official report of the librarian of the University of California it appears that three hundred volumes were stolen from the college library during the past year. This is a severe commentary on the character of the students of the State University. It means that the State is educating many young thieves in the institution of which we are all so proud. It is also a circumstance that reflects on the character-building efforts of the faculty. At the same time it bespeaks a woful lack of what is known as college spirit among the students. It should be the aim of the honest members of the student body to rid the university of the predatory element, and to safeguard the reputation of the institution. If imbued with the proper spirit it would not be difficult for them to apprehend the culprits. These peculations have been going on year after year, and it is a disgrace to the university that nothing has been done toward compassing the exposure of the thieves.

Osbourne's Play

Lloyd Osbourne, son of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, is back from London whither he went to supervise the production of his Napoleon play, "The Exile." The play was not a success nor was it a complete failure. However it would not have been surprising if it had been hissed off the stage, for the popular British prejudice against Napoleon is still too great to permit any play in which he figures to be a success unless he is caricatured. The British cannot forgive the Corsican who humbled Britain and almost scared the islanders out of their senses. But there is in London a well known actor who bears a strong resemblance to Napoleon and who has long wished to impersonate the great hero on the stage. Osbourne, who had written many plays without having a single one accepted, promised to supply this ambitious actor with the thing that he wanted. He therefore wrote the play and he considers it a triumph that it was even endured in London. I am told that it is a very sad play, and that its one great scene deals with a pathetic incident in Napoleon's life in exile. The soldier

The Passing of Leo

For over a week the whole world has been watching the mere shadow of a man at the Vatican struggling with death. Pope Leo XIII is passing into the gloom, but at this writing, Thursday afternoon, he continues to defy all physical laws, belie the prophecies of his physicians and live on. With undiminished virility he discourses with those around him on a variety of topics. No wonder that one of the physicians, after viewing the exhausted body in which no fuel remained, and hearing the patient, whose functions had almost ceased but whose mind had lost none of its alertness, discuss questions of the most serious import, exclaimed, "I feel that I am witnessing a miracle." The Pope has no right to be alive scientifically speaking but the flame of his wonderful intellect burns on though the end is fast approaching. The world awaits the passing in sympathy and reverence for the world knows that here was a man stronger than any monarch among his contemporaries, yet pious as the humblest devotee of the church, a mighty churchman in an unreligious age, who was ever the exemplar of gentleness and kindness, and who never faltered in his devotion to his ideals or to his God.

Gossip of the Service

Two of our resident army officials welcomed the arrival of relatives by the Thomas last week. Lieutenant J. A. Woodruff of the Engineer Corps is a son of Brigadier General C. A. Woodruff, and Lieutenant G. B. Rodney a nephew of the new commanding officer at the Presidio. Captain B. F. Cheatham of the Quartermaster's Department, who was one of the passengers on the Thomas, is well known in San Francisco, having formerly been stationed here. Major George O. Squier, the new Chief Signal Officer of this Department arrived on the Thomas. When the transport again sails for Manila on the first of August among the passengers will be Colonel John D. Kerr and Mrs. Kerr, Lieutenant-Colonel William A. Simpson, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry P. McCain, Major and Mrs. William A. Mann, Captain Robert E. L. Mitchie and Captain William W. Gibson.

It is understood that Lieutenant-Colonel John McE. Hyde is to be relieved as Chief Quartermaster of the Department of California.

Lieutenant William R. Bettison left the Presidio early in the week for his new station at West Point, where he expects to remain for the next two years.

After his strenuous remarks President Roosevelt may think he is entitled to the fruits thereof, so he may be pleased to get the happy tidings that the stork is hovering over the homes of the Walter Magees and Georgie Hopkins that was. The latter is with the family at Prosser Creek.

Pinkerton Bunkoed in the Orient

Mr. William A. Pinkerton, the famous detective, returned the other day from Yokohama where he rubbed the glamour of the Orient from the palimpsest of his imagination. From my correspondent in the Far East who met the detective during his travels in the Orient, I have received the following newsy paragraphs:

Mr. Pinkerton was far too wise to "hustle the East" as he has hustled his native West. Long years of bitter experiences inflicted upon others—has taught the great detective that if you play the other man's game you must carry marked cards in your own kit. The man from Chicago crossed the tropic of Cancer with no other intention than might be expressed in a desire to meet the Oriental in his own paddy field. I am assured by Mr. Pinkerton that he went among those guileless people without a single sinister purpose, and he endeavors to prove his assertion by the fact that while he was in Hongkong one of the natives passed an iron dollar on him in lieu of the genuine Mexican worth thirty-three and one-third cents more than a bad counterfeit. The nemesis of forgers and coiners never suspected that his dollar was worthless until he attempted to pass it on a jinrikisha man. He learned then that it is the custom in Hongkong, as it is the custom throughout the Far East, to ring all metal coin before deciding whether to accept it or not. There is not the slightest doubt that if Mr. Pinkerton had been "on the trail" he would have been also on his guard. Furthermore, if you see him "ringing" coin during his stay in San Francisco you will understand why he has acquired this singular habit. Of course when Mr. Pinkerton found out that he had been bunkoed with the iron dollar of Oriental commerce, he felt disposed to pocket his loss and say nothing about it. It is his business to apprehend men who pass counterfeit money, and, as a rule, he practices what he preaches. But in this instance he violated his first principles by passing the iron dollar on the executioner of Canton. "I didn't like the looks of the chartered assassin," said Mr. Pinkerton in explanation. "He was fat and sleek and oily, and he grinned hideously as he showed me how easy it is to cut off a man's head. I tipped him that iron dollar without a twinge of conscience, and I am certain that the murdering scoundrel will not lose a cent by the transaction."

A Fascinating Adventuress

Mr. Pinkerton met some old acquaintances in the Asiatic ports visited by him. One of these was the Baroness Mae de Pellandt. There are many false baronesses and countesses in the Far East, but the Baroness de Pellandt is not one of these. She is legally entitled to the honorific, having trapped and married one of the million barons of Germany. She has used the title to good effect ever since and it is said that in addition to the profits accruing from the creditors she has swindled and the plunder acquired from unwary globe trotters, she will receive ten thousand dollars from the baron as soon as he is awarded his decree of divorce. In the meanwhile the baroness is going about like a roaring lioness seeking more men to devour. She is accompanied by her brother, Jen Dugass, who acts as her chaperon and guarantee of good faith and respectability. She has a young millionaire in leash and it is her avowed intention to marry him as soon as she is free of the baron. Her fiance is twelve to fourteen years younger than herself but as long as it cannot be charged that she is old enough to be his mother the fool infatuate is content in his folly. When some one who knew the baroness by reputation hinted that she was an adventuress and that she did not dare to land at either Hongkong or Shanghai, on her way northward, en route to Europe over the great circle and the Canadian Pacific, this young man, who cannot or will not understand, wanted to shoot the traducer of his lady love. He was finally dissuaded from his murderous purpose by the information that if he killed the man who had slandered the baroness he would probably be hanged according to Japanese law, which places woman a little lower than the gods but somewhat inferior to man, whose companion she may be but whose chattel she certainly is. The baroness has been published in San Francisco and that is why she prefers to travel by the Canadian Pacific. She is afraid that if her victim is too frequently informed of her past he will take fright and escape. Mr. Pinkerton, however, is of the opinion that the Pellandt need have no fear of such disastrous denouement. The young man is hooked beyond all redemption. And such is one phase of life in the Far East as the great detective has glimpsed it in his swift observation.

Met an Old Acquaintance

Mr. Pinkerton was walking along the streets of a city in China, wondering why the Chinese look with such scorn on the intruding foreigner and finally laying all the blame on the self-seeking missionaries and their tributary "rice Christians," otherwise sacerdotal mercenaries converted from heathenism for revenue only, when a familiar face loomed through the surging throng, reviving memories that had been filed in the archives of the Pinkerton agency for more than a decade and a half. It was the face of a man whom the detective had sent to the penitentiary in one of the Northwestern States. It could not be said that the man was an old friend, but Mr. Pinkerton felt that their ancient intimacy justified such recognition as is accorded in a foreign land even to a "bowing acquaintance." Whereupon he accosted the man by his penitentiary name previous to his effacement in a numerical designation. The man stared at the detective with well simulated astonishment, and assuming the broadest accent of the transplanted Londoner denied his identity, declaring that Mr. Pinkerton had "mistaken his man, don't ye know." The Chicago man is used to this sort of thing and insisted that he was not mistaken. He furthermore congratulated the man in the street upon the admirable accent he had adopted—an accent that could scarcely be distinguished from that of Bow Bells or Piccadilly. Finally, when Mr. Pinkerton had assured the man that he was not to be disturbed in whatever reputation he might have acquired, the ex-convict confessed that he was living in that Far Eastern community under a false pretense. He had been a respected citizen of that city for eleven years and was not only rich but influential. He thought that he had put his past far behind him, and until Mr. Pinkerton spoke to him he had virtually forgotten the prison episode of his youth. He hoped Mr. Pinkerton would not betray him to his fellow citizens, and when he had obtained this assurance he wanted to pay the detective for his consideration, offering him the pick of the most expensive silversmithery in the metropolis. Mr. Pinkerton was subsequently introduced to this man at the swell club of the city, thereby confirming his claim to respectability.

The Paradise of Adventurers

Mr. Pinkerton will tell you many interesting stories of an import similar to this one, of gentlemen adventurers who are endeavoring to "hustle the East," despite Kipling's weird warning to the contrary. Many of these soldiers of fortune are remittance men from ancestral halls in old England—younger sons of younger sons unfitted for the army, the navy or the church; wild blades, too lazy to work and too willing, on occasion, to use the names of their rich relations, for the beguilement of unsuspecting creditors and careless money lenders. Others are in this land of promise because their native land promised nothing—driven by stress of circumstance to seek the greener grass that grows in pastures far from their own doorsteps. The cities of the Asiatic littoral are crowded with men from every part of the world, waiting on the bunds of Yokohama, Nagasaki, Shanghai, Hongkong and Manila, for the ships that pass in the night bearing the loot of the Indies or bringing tidings of battle, murder and sudden death that shall profit these patient watchers along shore—these gamesters risking the hazard of the die with eager expectation and imperturbable confidence in the future.

In Retrospection

Could I turn back all the leaves of life,
Correct the blunders and soothe the strife;
Could I blot out every dark deed done,
Make good each triumph unjustly won;
Could I live free from the faults of men,
I would not. Living my life again,
I'd do each deed as I did it then.
This life were surely a tiresome page
If man, arriving at sour old age,
Have nothing braver to grace his bier
Than a prudent life and a just career.

MABEL PORTER PITTS.

Letters of a Hand-Painted Mother to Her Daughter

I.

My dear Louise,

As you journey through society you must pay as you go. Always remember that. If it isn't in money, the payment is made somehow, in loss of looks, health, spirits. So be very careful. Don't dance late or long, and never with impecunious youths. I know college boys are very jolly and generous but as a rule they never amount to much. I was a college belle myself—and see how the roses in my cheeks withered after I finally fell a victim to Cupid. I should never have had to pad my hips or rouge my cheeks had I married the rich soap man instead of your father. I should have had a maid and masseuse of my own. Don't think, dear Louise, that I am mercenary, but I cannot see why all the skittles and beer should fall one way. Be a good girl now, and try and yoke yourself to some shekeled chap, young or old doesn't matter much. It would be a pity to miss your chance. You may never have a chance to visit the city again while you're as attractive as you are now. A bird in town is worth two in a village, you know, dear.

Your loving Mamma.

II.

Dearest Louise,

Don't for a moment think I am chiding you but I think you made a big mistake in taking that automobile trip without a chaperon. It is all right, my dear, to do such things when you have reached the age of artificial roses and aids to beauty, but when you're young you should never do such indiscreet things. Indiscretions are only pardoned in the ultra-rich or the emancipated bohemienne. In your position, that of a marriageable girl with no dot, the only proper course is to be ingenue straight through. Of course I know the Man was a parti. However, dear Louise, even a parti becomes less "easy" when you grant him such a privilege as a chaperonless motor spin a deux. Few men are worth wasting one's reputation on, and never beyond a certain point should you go, my dear. That point is speedily reached with a man who shows signs of—well, you understand, Louise. Now, all I can say, cherie, is: Don't do it again. Think of Punch, and don't.

Your worried Mamma.

III.

Sweet daughter,

Your last was most encouraging. I've looked forward for years to being the mother-in-law of millions. They never came my way directly—you know, dear, I told you of my foolish refusal of the soap man—but when you were born I said to myself: "Here's where my future lies." You say the young man is somewhat of a fool. Well, dear, better a fool with money than one without—and you know a fool and his money are soon parted, which will be good for your private bank account. Now don't let yourself be carried away by any foolish ideas of romance and that sort of thing. You've brains enough to carry ten fools through a dinner-party, not to speak of to the altar. Hold your lines loosely, but give a strong pull when the right time comes. There are lots of good fish in the sea, it is true, but they aren't all goldfish.

Your expectant Mamma.

A Tale of Extremes

There was a girl once of whom men said "She goes the pace." And that was not all that they said. But the girl was so constituted that she did not care what men said, and knowing this, these very same men were none too careful about making remarks. Being both young and beautiful, the girl had a decided advantage over her less favored sisters. Men rushed her unceasingly. In fact, the girl never stopped long enough, in her mad career, to reflect on what would be when the dark days came. But the dark days did come, even to the girl who went "the pace." She faded, and fading passed into the unattractive stage. Looking back upon her past triumphs and realizing the contrast she grew miserable. "Ah, woe is me!" she sighed desperately.

There was yet another girl of whom men said nothing, because, you know, she gave them nothing to say. Her life was so pure, so good, so immaculate, that even girls looked reverently as she passed their way. Men were afraid to touch even the hem of her garment. They walked by on the other side of the street. And so it was that this girl, who likewise was beautiful, walked ever on and on as might walk in very truth God's saint.

But Time had no more consideration for the good girl than for the girl of shame. He tampered with her complexion and changed the color of her hair.

Feeling this keenly and realizing the contrast between what she once was and what she had now become, she grew unreasonably miserable.

"What a life it is, to be sure. I have, I know, led a blameless life, and it is an excellent thing to be blameless, yet I have not once tasted of love or passion. Ah, woe is me!" she sighed desperately. —The Cynic.

VII.—HOW TO BECOME A GENIUS.

Let him that would a genius be
Mark well my simple recipe.
Obeying each injunction made
With faith devout and unafraid,
He soon will mount the heights of Fame
And hear men babbling his name.

All ancient laws we laugh to scorn;
Thus, bards today are made, not born.
And artists, and musicians too,
And all the heaven-assaulting crew
By huckster's tricks, and faker's fads,
And use of modern sign-board ads.,
Make of themselves what they would be.
Thou too? Then heed my recipe:

First, let thy hair grow unconfined,
Bush out each side and flow behind,—
Bush out like Keith's, that knows no comb
Save when the paint-smeared fingers roam;
Flow back, as Keeler's locks flow back,
All smooth, with affectation's smack;
Or as the locks of Miller flow,—
Wild sport for all the winds that blow!

Since Samson's secret has been learned
All men of genius have discerned
That hair uncombed and of good length
Is evidence of mental strength.
(This argument is not quite plain
Since Samson showed some lack of brain,
Yet grow long hair,—that must be done
If thou wouldst be a Mighty One.)

Next, let thy fancy have wide range
And clothe thyself in something strange.
The quiet garb of common sense
Will not befit thy consequence.
Thou must be marked above the crowd
By such as Fashion ne'er allowed—
A dress which shouts to us full clear:
"Behold! A genius walketh here!"

Thus don a suit of corduroy
As does Charles Lummis, and enjoy
The wonder that the dress inspires
Among conventional attires;
To hear folks say: "Yes, that is HIM!
How wide is his sombrero's brim!"
"Yes, truly; but"—and this with pride,—
"They say his fame is quite as wide!"

Or don, with Miller's solemn air,
The smelly skin of some dead bear;
In miner's boots thy trousers stuff
And wear a waistcoat loud enough
To scare a train; or proudly go
Like Dixon, with pants rolled to show
The high, slim heels, all well displayed,
Of cowboy boots, to order made!

Last, but not least, give freedom's reign
To speech and manners most insane.
Deem not politeness worth thy while;
Be rude, be rough, be full of bile;
Use phrases strangely full of sound
(And nothing else) and stalk around
Contemptuous in thy upper cloud
Of all the plebeian under crowd.

And be industrious as a bee
To advertise each vagary
As does wise Burgess, he whose brow
Was laureled by the "Purple Cow."
Let none forget or overlook
That thou hast writ a foolish book;
But do as Burgess did, and lay
Thy lettuce on thy head and say
(By action), "I came not to dine;
I'm BURGESS! See me feed my swine!"

* * * * * *

Now hast thou read my recipe;
Obey and immortality
Will weave a halo round thy brow,
And all the world will to thee bow.
No matter if thy gifts be small,
Fake well, and thou hast compassed all!
Although the gods deny thee sense,
Fake well, and thou hast eminence!

A Cogent Reason

"My dear Reggie," she said, lightly, "of course it is final. We have always been the best possible friends, but this idea of yours of marrying me is quite preposterous."

"Then you love your husband," he remarked dejectedly.

"Horrors! no," she exclaimed.

"Then why do you decline my suit?"

"Because," she replied, "you have become familiar with all my methods of deceiving a husband, and if I married you I couldn't have a bit of fun."

Automobile Topics

A test of motor cycles, the second of importance held in this country, was finished a week ago in New York, and great progress in the manufacture of those machines was shown. Last year on the run from New York to Boston, of thirty-one machines which started thirteen finished, and of these seven only had perfect scores—the perfect score being based on arrival at the goal within the prescribed time after having faithfully observed all the rules in regard to care of the motor. This time the rules were made more severe. All operators were required to repair or readjust their machines while on the road, the time consumed counting against them if they failed to reach their destination on time. Formerly repairs and adjustments were permitted during the intervals of rest previously arranged for, without loss to the contestants. Thirty-two machines left New York and sixteen returned with perfect scores. This eclipses even the endurance record of the regular safety bicycle during the early stages of its development, and it surpasses by far the showing made by the automobiles on their run from New York to Rochester two years ago, when only about two-fifths of those that started finished with any credit at all. The motor cycle is the plutter-plutter of the highroad. It bears to the automobile the relation that the naphtha plutter-plutter bears to the steam yacht.

Walter Magee has sold his auto not because he didn't like it, but because he couldn't keep out of trouble while in it. He was always running over somebody.

It would be a good thing for the industry if all reckless people could be persuaded to sell their autos. Most of those that are always getting into trouble would be similarly involved if pursuing any other occupation that requires the exercise of ordinary discretion. But every time an accident happens to a reckless individual the papers lay all the blame on the automobile.

The National Automobile Company has received its six carloads of machines from the East and bids fair to be sending for another cargo in the near future. This company has been proselyting as far north as Eureka, Humboldt county, and several of its machines are now in operation up there.

After the disastrous Paris-Madrid race the Government did not proceed to enact severe regulations, but instead of doing so appointed a parliamentary committee to study automobile legislation. This committee will devise the best possible means for removing the objections which the general public not using automobiles make to these vehicles. —The Automobilist.

An Interrupted Dream

By Bessie L. Russell.

"I have thought it all out," said The Woman Who Had Determined. "I have come to the only rational way of looking at this matter. I will give him up! It will mean a struggle I know, but I can do it. It is wearing me out, living in this constant fear of detection. Why, he haunts my steps by day, my dreams by night. I am tired of it all. How I long for the old peace, the peace I had before I met him."

The woman stooped to pluck a rose from her favorite bush. Fastening it in the folds of her lace negligee, she went on dreamily:—

"I will sweep away all morbid thoughts, desires. I will brush him out of my life completely."

A footfall in the gravel behind her gave the woman a sudden start. She turned to face The Man Who Had Determined.

"A penny for your thoughts, Love," he said softly. "What was making you so serious just now?"

"Me?" the woman replied, falteringly, "I—was dreaming a very serious dream, don't you know, but—but—it was only a dream. This is reality. I'm awfully glad you've come."

And there was a victorious half smile on the lips of The Man Who Had Determined.

"I hear she's riding horseback bareheaded just to get her face tanned."

"I'm glad she's having something done to it. I notice that the fashionable craze for tan is confined to women with a complexion they're glad to get rid of by almost any means."

STAGE

Chambers's Curious Drama

Mr. Haddon Chambers has achieved a wonderful hodgepodge of bathos and pathos in "A Modern Magdalen." Nothing quite so inartistic in serious play-writing was ever before put upon the theatrical market. Mr. Chambers started out to write a very tragic drama with the kind assistance of numerous play-builders that had gone before, and while engaged in the development of the plot he found that he could not enter into the spirit of the hackneyed situations so he burlesqued them. The result is a curious blending of farce comedy and handkerchief drama. The play lacks verisimilitude, and there is a discordant note echoing through all its scenes. The character that affords you the most amusement is an exotic. You laugh at the witticisms of Hiram Jenkins and all the while you feel that he ought to be kicked off the stage. Fancy being amused by a dissolute father who approves his daughter's shame and lives off the wages of her sin! But Mr. Wilton Lackaye who plays this role is not to blame for the handiwork of Mr. Haddon Chambers. He plays Hiram Jenkins conscientiously and almost succeeds in investing the character with the air of plausibility. Indeed his performance is exceptionally artistic. In Katinka Jenkins, Miss Bingham has a role quite familiar to theatregoers, that of the wayward daughter who does the best she can which is quite well thank you, but who is continually suffering pangs of remorse. Miss Bingham wastes an awful lot of energy and nerve force on the role, for Katinka is a most improbable young woman.

Amelia Bingham's Next Play

Amelia Bingham's play for next season is already selected and the costumes and scenery are being made in New York. The play will cost about forty thousand dollars before the curtain is rung up the first night. The title is "The Canterbury Pilgrims" and the play is a dramatization of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Miss Bingham will be the Wife of Bath and the female part has been somewhat lengthened and re-written for her, as the play was originally intended for a male star, E. H. Sothern, who accepted it and then decided that the woman's part was too strong, and changed his mind. The play is intensely dramatic and spectacular and calls for one hundred and twenty people, who are already being engaged for it. There will be several horses and mules in it, too, and the scenery will be immense. The last act shows the Cathedral of Canterbury while a high mass is going on. The play is by a son of Steele Mackaye. The Binghams say that the next will be their last season, but of course we know how much that means. Lackaye will not be with Miss Bingham next season as he is to star in a dramatization of the late Frank Norris's novel "The Pit." He deserves the opportunity, for after his marvelous performance as the father of "The Modern Magdalen" no one can doubt his ability. Nothing cleverer has been seen on local boards for a long time.

Miss Bingham deplores the cost of modern railway transportation. For one act of "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson" she is having the scenery painted here as it was cheaper than to bring it across the continent. The scene is a boudoir and the entire scenery was of carved and raised wood, a most sumptuous effect being produced. But it was so heavy that it could not be moved at current rates.

A SUCCESSFUL SALE.

This is the end of the second week of Kelly and Liebes's great removal sale, and the crowd continues to come for next week's specials. All the fine tailor suits will be offered at a great bargain. The entire line of $25.00, $20,00 and $18.00 suits will sell at $10.00. Cloaks, skirts and waists will be at the same low prices at 120 Kearny street.

On the Burlesque Stage

There isn't much in a name so far as a burlesque entertainment is concerned, and "Under the Red Globe" with "The Three Musketeers" would afford just as much amusement by any other name. It is akin to all the other absurdities that have served to give the merry mummers at Fischer's opportunities to exploit their specialties. It goes with the same dash and spirit and rollicking abandon that have characterized its predecessors, and it is interspersed with a sufficient number of new features, musical and other kinds, to justify the name being changed. One of the new features which makes a most pronounced hit is the "Peroxide Sisters" stunt of Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson. They give a most amusing imitation of two amateur soubrettes. These two dancing girls have become such great favorites at the O'Farrell street playhouse that the management is compelled to give them greater prominence each week. Barney Bernard has improvised a role for himself in the new piece, and monopolizes a great deal of the laughter in the first act, and George Lask has achieved some new effects with the chorus. Lask and musical director James deserve a great deal of credit for the success of the performance. The orchestra and chorus work together with splendid precision, and it is marvelous that so much action and so many pretty pictures are produced on such a small stage. The vocal features are up to the standard of the little playhouse, and of these "Love's Reverie," a duet between Maud Amber and Winfield Blake, is the most effective. Kolb and Dill have their usual comical conversations and are given the same prominence that they have hitherto enjoyed. The piece will no doubt have the average run.

The Cast at the California

In "In the Palace of the King" to be presented next week as the opening play of the Neill-Morosco season, the leading character, Dolores, is taken by Lillian Kemble, a handsome brunette. Don John will be represented by George Soule Spencer. Inez, the blind girl, sister to Dolores, will be played by Elsie Esmond, another new face to San Francisco. Miss Esmond is a graceful girl with soulful eyes which she is said to control so steadily that the assumption of blindness is made almost painful in its intensity. Thomas Oberle as the Spanish monarch and Frederic Sumner as Perez, his secretary, are two very talented actors who are as yet strangers to San Francisco. Frank MacVicars, as the Cardinal, H. S. Duffield as the stern father of Dolores and Phosa McAllister as the Duchess are three old favorites who will be warmly welcomed. Another of the new ones is Adora Andrews who will play the part of the scheming Princess Eboli. The second production of the Neill-Morosco season will be Genevieve Haine's modern society drama, "Hearts Aflame."

Nance as Juliet

Nance O'Neil is not a traditional Juliet, neither is she an ideal one. The tragedy queen has neither the romantic temperament nor the passionately poetical nature for the interpretation of the role. However a new Juliet is always interesting, and Nance O'Neil acts well even when she doesn't feel her part. She plays the ill-fated heroine in all her phases with consummate skill. She omits some of the bits of business we have become accustomed to, but introduces others that are as effective. In the tomb scene the arrangement of scenery is not what one usually sees, but it gives a much more vivid impression. Ratcliff's Romeo is full of poetry and vigor and gives him an opportunity to display a fine pair of legs. Stockwell's Peter is a delicious bit of comedy. Fanny Young as the Nurse, Herbert Carr as Friar Lawrence, Edward Nannery as Tybalt and Millward as Mercutio are especially strong in the spirit of the drama. Armour's Apothecary is an effective bit. Nance O'Neil has filled out her week in repertory. She has had a remarkably successful season at the California, every night appearing to large houses. On the night "Hedda Gabler" was produced there was an overflowing auditorium. The uncanny Ibsen drama seems to appeal to more than the morbid intellect, judging by its vogue.

What Will Happen?

Not long ago word came to me from New York: "If Ratcliff attempts to show himself on Broadway he will be hissed off the stage." A man who has had the unsavory newspaper prominence of Ratcliff would naturally have many things to contend with on returning to his old haunts. Yet I have heard that the stories circulated against the erstwhile matinee favorite were largely inspired by his exceedingly indignant ex-wife and her people. I have also heard that Nance O'Neil intends to have Ratcliff in her Broadway company. He is a finished actor, as he has proved in the many parts played in San Francisco. At first, coming from society dramas, his work in Miss O'Neil's repertory of tragedies lacked conviction. But his Holofernes was a strong characterization, aside from his tendency to rant. His Scarpia was his best work. He labors under the disadvantages of having a comedy face, and not having his facial muscles under absolute control, but otherwise he is a most convincing actor.

Bertha Creighton's Princess Flavia is one of the best things that she has done with the Alcazar stock. It is a graceful interpretation characterized by simplicity and delicate charm. Butler as Sapt is excellent and of course Whittlesey in the dual role is all that the most romantic could wish. Juliet Crosby's work in the prologue wins much commendation.

Late in the week the Alcazar management, owing to the inability to satisfy the demand for seats for "The Prisoner of Zenda," decided to postpone "The Manxman's" opening night until July twenty-seventh. "The Prisoner of Zenda" will be continued all next week.

Bostonians Still Alive

The H. C. Barnabees are located at their home on Riverside Drive, and Mr. Barnabee is enjoying the rest after his arduous tour. He will shortly celebrate his seventieth birthday, but he has no intention of retiring from the stage yet awhile. The Bostonians open their New York season at the Academy of Music on August twenty-fourth, and later in the year they will tour. They will go West but are not sure yet whether the Pacific coast will be included in the tour. This is the twenty-fifth year of the Bostonians' existence.

The Miller-Anglin Season

Mr. Henry Miller and Miss Margaret Anglin are to appear at the Columbia this year under the management of Mr. Charles B. Dillingham who will be represented by Louis Nethersole, brother of the famous Olga. The Miller-Anglin season will open August seventeenth in Richard Harding Davis's new play, "The Taming of Helen," which will be followed by revivals of "The Lady of Lyons" and 'Camille." A large company is being engaged for the support of the joint stars.

Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall is again in San Francisco, after an absence of several months in the Hawaiian Islands and the South. The psychologist is booked for a series of Sunday evening lectures at Steinway hall on "Practical Psychology." The first lecture will be given tomorrow night, the subject being "Life Secrets." Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has scores of friends and admirers here, and is sure to attract large audiences. He possesses the rare faculty of expounding the principles and theories of psychic science in a graspable, convincing manner, at the same time that he pleases the eye and charms the ear. There is something so elusively fascinating about the personality of this highly-strung Englishman that one wants to see and hear him again and again. He reminds one of a high-bred, spirited race horse, with his well proportioned slimness and clearcut, sensitive face. On the following Sunday night, July twenty-sixth, Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will lecture on "The Thought That Kills."

In the June Munsey, comment was made on Margaret Anglin's Camille and the impression was given that the revision of the play was done entirely by Miss Anglin. On the contrary, it was Henry Miller's idea to have the supper scene brought up to date, and the death scene to take place in bed. And it was Louise Veiller, a San Francisco writer, who modernized the dialogue and brought it up to the new century standard.

S. H. Friedlander is the business representative of the Humphrey-Mordant company playing a stock season at the Macdonough theatre, Oakland. Edwards Davis, the ex-Oakland preacher, will make his debut as a stage star in his old clerical camping ground next Monday night. He will appear in "The Unmasking," a play dramatized from a novel he wrote of that name. Davis has a lot of press notices from Eastern papers of prominence that point to his becoming a Broadway star some day.

Mr. Raymond W. Peck has joined the forces of Fischer's theatre. He came from Chicago where he achieved something of a reputation as a writer of burlesques and musical skits. He is to do the writing for the local burlesque house.

Ezra Kendall in "The Vinegar Buyer" comes from New York to the Columbia following the engagement of Amelia Bingham. Kendall has proven a big winner and his first season as a star has been remarkably successful.

Eleanor Jenkins has been engaged for the Fay Templeton roles at Fischer's.

Features of Next Week's Bills

There will be but a week of Amelia Bingham and her company in Clyde Fitch's latest comedy success, "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson," at the Columbia. The original superb scenic equipment in its entirety together with the gowns especially prepared by Paquin and Worth will be displayed here for the coming production. The cast will include besides Miss Bingham, Lackaye, Abington, Carew, Bijou Fernandez and Adelyn Wesley.

"Macbeth" tomorrow night will close Nance O'Neil's season at the California. On Monday night will open the summer stock season of the Neill-Morosco company. "In the Palace of the King," the opening bill, was presented some time since at the Columbia by Viola Allen but this will be its first stock presentation, at popular prices. There will be bargain matinees on Thursdays.

The Alcazar company will be the first stock to present Hall Caine's play "The Manxman," in which Wilson Barrett and James O'Neill successively and successfully starred. The play is founded on Caine's first novel of importance, and which still with many ranks as his best. White Whittlesey will have the title role. There will be a powerful cast and exquisite pictures including the orchard of the Manx Fairy Inn.

Harold Crane will be heard in a new Coster song entitled "I 'aven't told 'im." Budd Ross will furnish a tramp specialty, Louise Moore will sing "Zamona" and "The Belle of Murray Hill," the Esmeralda Sisters and Arnold Grazer will introduce a novel dance. Herbert Sears will have a song called "The Promoter" and Anna Wilks and Budd Ross will add to their popularity by a new song and dance called "The Quidnunc Fly," the composition of George P. Towle, musical director of the theatre. A new march of beautiful girls is among the attractions, the latest invention of the stage manager, Charles H. Jones.

Camille d'Arville and Edwin Stevens, twin-starring in "The Highwayman," are a great big attraction for the Tivoli. Hartman, Webb and Annie Meyers will also be of the cast. The opera is timed toward the close of the Georgian period when life still belonged to the romantic school of fiction, so the scope for costuming and staging is practically unlimited. Soldiers, constables, milkmaids, foxhunters, gypsies, country squires and dames all combine to make a series of stage pictures as novel as they are attractive and no expense has been spared in exactly reproducing the original production.

"Under the Red Globe" and "The Three Musketeers" have scored a hit at Fischer's, and will go all next week. Preparations are going on for the next double bill, when the public will see for the first time "The Big Little Princess" and the funny burlesque on "Quo Vadis" called "Quo Vass Iss."

The beginning of the Central's third season will be especially brilliant, with the standard play "Faust" as the bill and Herschel Mayall making his debut as the new leading man of the theatre. The great Brocken scene will be given with new and startling effects. "Faust" may be counted on to break all records for packed houses at the Central and the management suggests that tickets should be ordered early.

At the Orpheum Ethel Levy, who off the stage is the wife of George M. Cohan, the well-known song and farce writer of the Four Cohans, will make her first appearance here. Claude Gillingwater, for four years with David Belasco's forces and who will be principal support to Mrs. Leslie Carter in her new play next season, will present "The Wrong Man," a one-act comedy. He brings a company of five including Nina Lyn, a beautiful English actress brought to this country by Belasco to play Madame Dufrain in the original production of "Zaza." The Orpheus Comedy Four will give a musical act. The three Poles, graceful and daring acrobats, promise an extraordinary act which they call "the human trapeze." They have never appeared in San Francisco. George W. Hunter, a London comedian and raconteur who has just arrived from Australia, is said to be a quaint funmaker. Bailey and Madison, Hodges and Launchmere and the biograph will complete the program.

At the Chutes will be Harry and Carrie La Kola in a unique Japanese juggling act; the three Melverns, sensational parlor acrobats; Kraft and Caley, singing and dancing duo, and Alvino, and acrobat who plays several musical instruments during his specialty. Van Possen and McCauley will change their songs and dances and George Hanlon and company will appear for the last times.

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

Madame Blauvelt in Opera

Madame Blauvelt seems to have satisfied the London press and public on the occasion of her operatic debut as Marguerite in "Faust," fully as well as she has in her concert work. Naturally the strangeness of her surroundings and the transition from the concert stage at first caused her to appear ill at ease and rather nervous, showing somewhat in her acting, although her vocal work was most brilliant and satisfying. This embarrassment, however, soon wore off and her second appearance at Covent Garden was an almost unqualified success. She appears this week as Juliette and last Saturday, when Madame Calve sang Carmen she was the Michaela. Later on she is cast for Suzanne in "The Marriage of Figaro."

Some splendid musical attractions will be here in October. Mr. Will Greenbaum announces that the Duss orchestra will give concerts here, with Madame Nordica and Katherine Fisk as soloists.

Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas

Many teachers forget that, for a due comprehension of the highest style of art, a sum of knowledge and experience, a certain degree of mental maturity, are required, without which all endeavors to force a taste for the most elevated objects will be vain, or possibly productive of disgust. The study of Beethoven's music should be earnestly entered upon after the mind has been cultivated by a course of education at once philosophic and elegant; without such a preparation, the study will infallibly be harassing and disagreeable even to those who possess more than common susceptibility for musical poetry. Music is the offspring of deep feeling, and by deep feeling alone can its genuine beauties be comprehended and enjoyed—Schindler-Moscheles.

A BUSINESS MAN WHOSE FAD IS BASEBALL.

There is probably no man in this part of the world who has such a genuine enthusiasm for baseball as Seymour R. Church of 307 Sansome street. When interest in the great American game languished for a time, Mr. Church tried to keep up public interest in baseball by every means in his power. When the game took its old place in popular estimation, there was not a more pleased man in San Francisco than Seymour R. Church. About three years ago he offered prizes for the best description of a baseball calendar that he got out, and which contained in miniature a comprehensive history of the game's progress. He has an immense collection of portraits of famous baseball players and these he intends soon to place on exhibition, free to the public. Mr. Church is one of San Francisco's prominent business men.

Their Penetration at Fault

"What an exquisite old cup and saucer," raved Mrs. Dilettante, as she stirred a lump of sugar daintily in her tea, "it surely must have an interesting history."

"Yes, I can just fancy your grandmother placing it with loving touch on the shelf of the old dining-room cupboard," rhapsodized Miss Bricabrac.

"I don't think grandma ever saw it," returned their hostess with a smile. "You know what a bargain fiend I am. I bought that cup and saucer—"

"At that antique store down town?" interrupted Mrs. Dilettante, eagerly.

"It must have been priceless," said Miss Bricabrac with a sigh.

"Not at all," remarked their hostess. "I bought it at a tea store sale with eight trading stamps."

LETTERS

Josephine Daskam's Latest

"Middle-Aged Love Stories" is an accurately descriptive tale. The book contains half a dozen love stories which do not concern the unripe beauties in their graduation year, but men and women of a more settled period of life. There is nothing about them to furnish food for giggles to the bread and butter misses who consider love the prerogative of their own green time, and those who have fallen into the habit of regarding Josephine Daskam as a recorder of the pranks of children will find that she can deal quite as agreeably with their elders. "The Valley of the Shadow," the first of these tales, tells of the agonies suffered by a household while the wife, mother and sister undergoes a dangerous operation. That is one love story, but there is still another hinted at. "A Philanthropist" was a benevolent spinster bent on reforming all creation, but her own reformation was successfully taken in hand when she least suspected it, and thereafter her time for presiding over Reformed Drunkards' Leagues and devising schemes whereby she could induce the peripatetic wanderers to earn a meal by piling kindling wood was effectively cut short. "A Hope Deferred" is a sad little story of a New England gentlewoman whose life's wish had been a trip to Europe. A cousin left her a legacy with which to carry out her desire, but at the last moment she resigned her plans in order that a homesick French exile should be enabled to return to his own land. "The Courting of Lady Jane" might have been a heart-tragedy, but it turned to comedy in time. Lady Jane was an old-young maid who engaged herself to a young-old man, but he discovered in time that it was her mother that he really wanted, while Lady Jane became aware at the same time that it was a youth of her own years who held the key of her heart. "Julia, the Apostate," should have settled down to bachelor-maidenhood as the chaperon of her two nieces, who were sailing on the coast of Bohemia, but in her heart she did not like to pilot their craft. A cousin opportunely turned up and took her ashore. "Mrs. Dud's Sister" was the opposite of Mrs. Dudley Hunter herself, a leader of the smart set, and as young and girly-girly as she could contrive to look and act. Her sister, somewhat younger, had no hankering after the life of excitement, but lived quietly, out of sight of the gay set, and while they romped and raced on the lawns in front, had her little romance quite out of sight and all unsuspected. In "A Reversion to Type" many a woman who has sacrificed youth to ambition will read her own story. It seems like such a wonderful thing for eighteen or twenty to "live her own life," and "do things," but after years spent in teaching successive classes of uninteresting and uninterested pupils, and looking both before and after, which does not wish that she had chosen otherwise? When one takes up a volume of short stories like this, it is always with a feeling of regret that so many of them have already made their appearance in the magazines, and so are the less apt to attract book-buyers. They are both good work and good workmanship, and the volume in which they are brought out is a neat and attractive one, from the house of Charles Scribner's Sons.

A Page Disappointment

Coming from the author of "Red Rock," "Marse Chan" and "Meh Lady," "Gordon Keith" is a disappointing book, though if it were the work of a writer from whom we have not learned to expect anything above the average, it would pass without much criticism. It is too long, since so much of the bulk is made up of matter that would have been as well omitted. The story is one of contrasts—the old patriarchal South with the new, and both with New York. Gordon Keith, the hero, is a manly young fellow who makes his way against odds, after the war has impoverished his father, albeit he is something of a prig, but how a villain of the Ferdy Wickersham type escaped being cowhided, at least, if not shot, even in the most free-and-easy Gotham set, is beyond comprehension. The episode of Ferdy and Phrony is reminiscent of Steerforth and Em'ly, and Terpy, of the Gumbolt dance hall, strongly recalls some of Bret Harte's melodramatic females. The coupling of the names Yorke and Lancaster, and the use of Rimmon as a name for the recalcitrant minister, savor of cheapness, and as a schoolmaster Gordon recalls the celebrated Hoosier to whom Edward Eggleston introduced us, though Gordon was so far ahead of his age that he might well have been a graduate of the present year from one of the athletic colleges. In fact, there lingers with one a general impression of the anachronistic throughout the book. The characters, considered individually, are better than the assembled whole, and the scenes which are laid in the South ring truer than those in New York and England. General McDowell Keith of the Confederate Army is a fine type of the Southern gentleman of the old school, and Gordon ably represents the new South. Aaron Wickersham is a type of the new rich, and Ferdy the gilded youth. Alice Yorke is the compliant daughter of the managing mamma, and Louise Caldwell is the climber, while the Wentworths, mother and son, are of the old, blue-blooded Republican nobility, and Rhodes may stand for him who has sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. There is plenty of action of all kinds, adventure, intrigue, love at cross purposes, stock manipulation, company promotion, success and failure. There are worse books that have sold by the hundred thousand, and the probabilities are that "Gordon Keith" will meet a fair share of popular approval. It compares favorably enough with the average novel of the day, and might be dismissed with the perfunctory praise which means nothing more than "good of its kind," but from Thomas Nelson Page we feel a prescriptive right to demand the best. It comes from the house of Charles Scribner's Sons, who have done their part in dressing it well. Illustrations are by George Wright. —The Bookworm.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Confounding of Camelia," by Anne Douglas Sedgwick:

There would be less cant and more comfort in the world if we would merely avoid treading on our neighbors' corns.

Strength, after all, is largely a matter of situation, and to stand in the street vainly cajoling one's pet on the housetop gives one all the emotions of acknowledged inferiority.

Most men don't mind ethical shortcomings in their wives—lying and meanness and the exploiting of other people—they forgive very ugly faults in a pretty woman.—Perior.

From "By the Stage Door," by Ada Patterson and Victory Bateman:

The penalty of absorbing friendships is that they set their possessors apart from all others. They have something of the isolation of genius. Octopus like, they absorb thought and time. There are times when the sense of this is poignant.

Women need the logic of men. It will save them from the unhappiness of women.

"There is a quiet dignity in old bachelorhood, leisure from cares, noise, etc., the enthronization upon an armchair of a man of feeling. He may sit, walk, read unmolested, to none accountable."—Charles Lamb.

Striving to be good, is a very direct road toward Goodness; and if life be so tempered by high motive as to make actions always good, Faith is unconsciously won.—"Dream Life," Donald G. Mitchell.

The way to get rid of doubts in religion, is to go to work with all our might and practice what we don't doubt, and that you can do whatever your calling or profession.—"My Wife and I," Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Is anything more wonderful than another if you consider it maturely? I have seen no men rise from the dead; I have seen some thousands rise from nothing. I have not force to fly into the sun, but I have force to lift my hand, which is equally strange.—Carlyle.

Pope Leo XIII.

Pope Leo's reign is over. The great pontiff surrendered his triple crown on Monday last, and all the civilized world mourned the loss of a mighty churchman distinguished by his rare attainments, by the clearness and accuracy of his intellect, by rigid uprightness and unostentatious piety, by the serenity of his temper and by the benevolence of his heart. To Pope Leo is due much of the change of attitude of Protestantism toward the Roman Catholic Church which is one of the most remarkable religious developments of recent years. Twenty-five years ago this whole country was stirred by a political agitation against the Roman Catholic Church which seemed ominous of a religious war. That church, then comparatively feeble on this continent, has now grown into the strongest in the Republic yet, instead of the bitterness of hostility against it proclaimed by the old Know-Nothingism, there have come harmony and respect. Through the benign influence of Pope Leo the Catholic Church gained many a moral victory, and the respect and admiration which he inspired greatly enhanced the prestige of the Vatican. It has been said that Leo was a liberal Pope, but as a champion of the faith he never wavered from the Catholic position or the theology of Thomas Aquinas. His so-called liberalism was merely a lucid statement of the Church's attitude from time immemorial. Under his wise administration the church has had a more direct effect upon the world because he has been closer to the people than men in such exalted position were in former ages. The world and all its statesmen and thinkers recognized in him a man of wonderful intellect and of remarkably broad views, and one who was sincerely devoted to the progress of civilization. So high did he stand in the estimation of the world that in his last illness Protestants joined with Catholics in celebrating the spiritual exaltation of his character, and the services he had rendered to Christianity. Such tributes as have come from Protestant pulpits would have been impossible when Leo XIII ascended the Papal throne. Yet at no time during his long pontificate was he conciliatory toward those who sought to abridge the rights of the church or its communicants. He was tactful and diplomatic, but always serene and optimistic in the face of opposition, and in dealing with prejudice and intolerance. He never faltered in the confidence which all devout Catholics repose in the assurance Christ gave to Peter that the gates of hell would never prevail against His church, and ever serene in his faith, he maintained the dignity and supremacy of the church without the slightest effort at conciliation. Nowhere did he make concessions that affected dogma. He dealt with the same old problems that have arisen in various lands ever since the Papacy was established, with the same old firmness and in the same old way. The traditions of the church have been rigidly adhered to, and not even in the slightest degree has the claim to temporal power been abated. It was in consequence of this claim that Leo was excluded from the Peace Conference at The Hague which was a failure, and since that memorable hippodrome the monarchs of Europe have been more eager than ever to enlist the friendship of the Vatican. When Leo was called upon to suppress the socialistic tendencies of Catholicism propagated by the Rev. Dr. McGlynn, he did so with such infinite tact as to utterly rout the adherents of the popular priest. Dire consequences were predicted but the prophecies are unfulfilled, and Father McGlynn went to Rome and made his peace with the head of his church. Leo took summary action in the case of Father Zahn, compelling him to withdraw his writings on the doctrine of evolution, and Sir George Mivart was forced out of the church for his failure to renounce his new-fangled theories about the hereafter. Leo was a liberal Pope, but he was always loyal to the ancient philosophy of his church. And now the voice of this great churchman and benevolent statesman is silent. He will live in history as a man of great intellectual force, a sincere Christian and a superb exemplar of gentleness and kindness. Whoever may be his successor can scarcely hope to rival his brilliant achievements.

Why Lane Is Favored

The local Republican machine is running so smoothly these days that the editor of the Call feels that he need not concern himself about party affairs. Mr. Herrin having extended the olive branch to Messrs De Young and Spreckels, those two eminent dictators of party policy gladly assented to the restoration of harmony, and now all the erstwhile conflicting elements in local Republican politics are partaking of a genuine love feast. The belligerent editors have ceased calling names, and they are ready to "take program" and acquiesce in most any old plan to secure control of the municipal government. Whatever the Republican slate they will be interested in its success, and therefore they have nothing to oppose except the interests of the Democracy. Hence the anxiety of the Call over the efforts that are being made to reorganize the Democracy and to wrest control of the machine from Gavin McNab. The wily McNab has always been held in high esteem in the Call office, and it is quite natural that Mr. Spreckels's paper should favor the nomination of the McNab candidate, Mr. Lane, for Mayor. The Call informs us that Mr. Lane does not want to be an Interstate Commissioner; that he intends to run for Mayor and that Mr. McNab will win the coming primary election. The wish is father to the thought in the Call office. The facts are, however, that Mr. Lane does wish to be an Interstate Commissioner, and that President Roosevelt has already been importuned in his behalf, but meanwhile he would not decline to run for Mayor if by entering the contest he could render assistance to his friend McNab. Moreover as there is no man in the Democratic party less objectionable to the corporations than Franklin K. Lane, the men engaged in manipulating Republican party politics would prefer to have their nominee beaten by him than by any other. Lane has always been persona grata to the allied quasi-public corporations of this city. Every provision of the charter that confers privileges upon those corporations was introduced at the suggestion of Mr. Lane, and during his long term as City Attorney he has never done anything to incur their disfavor. They did nothing to oppose him during his candidacy for Governor, and they would not seek to defeat him if he were nominated for Mayor. But the Republican bosses are desirous of maintaining Lane as a factor in Democratic politics especially for the purpose of perpetuating the reign of McNab. This Machiavellian individual, who has long posed as a reformer and who is always ready to accept a fee as an attorney when his influence is desired to invoke the friendly office of one of his creatures in the public service, be he judge, commissioner or Supervisor, is today losing his grip on the Democratic machine. The people by whom he has been employed in the past feel that they may need his services in the future, and they object to his being forced into retirement. But he has no following and will have to retire unless he can conjure with the name of Lane. Hence the importance of keeping Lane before the people, and hence the significance of the interest in Lane displayed by certain Republican leaders who have been accustomed to doing business with McNab. And the Fates have been very kind to McNab of late. Events appear to have been ordered propitiously for him. Just as preparations were being made by a powerful element in the party, which had the backing of the Examiner, to dump him into oblivion, it occurred to William R. Hearst that in pursuance of his policy to propitiate all factions in order to smooth the road to the Presidency, it would not be well to antagonize even the repudiated McNab. Thereupon the astonishing spectacle was presented of the newspaper proprietor stooping to a reconciliation with the man who had basely slandered him. And since then the anti-McNab movement has received little encouragement of the Examiner. However that movement is so strong that the probability is that even though Hearst were so treacherous as to attempt to stay its progress, he could not avert the downfall of McNab. But it is the hope of the repudiated boss that even though his organization be beaten at the primaries the victors will be forced to nominate Lane, who would of course be glad to restore him to power. Such is the situation today in local politics. Never before was it so complicated.

Roosevelt's Sudden Flop

Mr. Roosevelt is treading on dangerous ground. He had an interview with Mr. Hanna some days ago on the subject of the Postoffice scandals, and later on Postmaster-General Payne announced that he had been forbidden to give the press any further information concerning the discovery of postal frauds. It is evident that the President has bowed to the will of Senator Hanna. For a long time he affected indifference to the wishes of this purse-proud, practical and unprincipled politician, and his frequent manifestations of independence won for him the esteem of all people who despise servility in high office. But the President suddenly changed his attitude toward the representative in Washington of the plutocrats of Wall street. Mr. Hanna has frequently been referred to as the President-maker, and it appears that even Mr. Roosevelt has been converted to the notion that the services of the Senator from Ohio are indispensable in a national campaign. Postmaster Payne is the protege of Mr. Hanna, and two of his assistants are Hanna's pets. After the interview with the President, Hanna announced that Payne would not resign and Payne announced that he had been enjoined from giving out news of affairs in his office. Such prohibition must have been ordered by the President. Doesn't it look very much as though Mr. Roosevelt has made a very reprehensible deal with the Ohio Senator? Not many months ago the President asserted that publicity would prove an efficient deterrent of wrong-doing on the part of trusts and corporations. If so, publicity should not be objectionable in the case of corrupt Postoffice officials. Is not the President treading on dangerous ground? It may be well to remind him that secrecy is one of the expedients of which none but bad governments stand in need, and that it is the never-failing parent of dishonesty. But public opinion, which has reached Kings on their thrones and forced them to confine themselves to the limits of just authority, cannot be averted by interdicting all knowledge of a corrupt administration. The familiar slogan of the Tilden campaign, "Turn the rascals out," may once more be resorted to, and not in the far-distant future. Frauds in the War Department and frauds in the Postoffice Department have become so common as to be positively startling, and if President Roosevelt desires to escape responsibility he must insist on deep scrutiny and unlimited publicity.

The Microbe Scare

And now some brilliant savant has discovered that the eating of oysters conduces to foul language, high temper and insanity, thus adding one more to the list of terrible dangers of being alive. Whether there is any truth in these picturesque theories that strawberries cause suicide and oysters insanity, the very prosaic fact remains that the more publicity there is given to these discussions and assertions, the more the faker and the quack flourish, and the more the ignorant are victimized. Time was, and not so long ago, when people of considerable attainments were content to know that they had hearts, lungs, stomachs and livers, and to lump these organs with the rest and vaguely term them all "insides," whose vagaries were of interest to doctors and the respective owners of the particular organs that happened to be on the rampage. But some genius discovered the necessity for teaching school children physiology, with the result that a few years ago the pupils in the high schools could have passed as creditable an examination in that branch as the students of a medical college. Theory has been added to fact, and imagination has crowded theory, until today, between enlargements and microscopic analyses, newspaper exploitation of crude and undigested hypotheses, and daring speculation, not to add out-and-out fakes, the average individual, if he were to stop to think about the matter at all, would be literally scared to death. Ten years ago there was not one in a thousand who knew there was such a thing as an appendix, other than the one which appears at the end of books, but now not to have undergone an operation for appendicitis is to acknowledge oneself to be hopelessly plebeian, and not to be on speaking terms with half a dozen or more varieties of microbe is to be out of society altogether. The simplest and most commonplace actions, we are told, lead to the assimilation of alien bacteria, and whether we eat or drink, bathe or shave, change our clothing or brush our hair, we are running risks of contagion. To walk abroad in the streets or the woods subjects us to one form of deadly encounter, while to remain at home puts into direct contact with some equally dangerous parasite. In fact, the scientists, pseudo-scientists and exploiters of so-called science have educated the people to the point where, as Mark Twain put it, "They can hear the microbes gnaw." And all to what end? Are people any happier or any better as a result of all this foolishness? What is added to the sum of human happiness by sowing broadcast the statement that there are four million bacteria in a single spoonful of milk, or that there are seventy distinct varieties of microbes which infest the normal human being? If we must not breathe lest we inhale, nor eat lest we swallow, nor come into contact lest we annex a few odd millions of the little beasts, we may as well die at once and be done with it. Better be killed outright than scared to death. There used to be a law in Bulgaria to the effect that the makers of patent medicines who claimed for their compounds what they could not demonstrate to be the truth should serve a term in the penitentiary. Some such law with regard to the exploitation of absurd theories would add much to the comfort of plain, ordinary citizens, who cannot enjoy their Sunday dinner of potatoes and roast beef without being confronted by some disgusting statement regarding its far-reaching effects. The only "foul language, high temper and insanity" liable to result from indulgence in an oyster stew will be brought about by the quality of the viand and the amount of the bill.

The Modern Enoch

The perennial crop of Enoch Ardens grows apace, and the sentimental gushers continue to fill space by describing their home-comings. It is full time to treat these poetic gentlemen with stern common sense, and instead of brass bands, fatted calves and newspaper sentimentality, they should be met by the deputy sheriff in full official regalia. Enoch Arden was shipwrecked on a desert island, out of communication with the world, and there he had to remain, willy-nilly, till rescued by chance, but in these later days the world has contracted. There are no longer desert islands, and there is hardly a spot on the globe which is out of mail and telegraphic communication with civilization. The modern "Enoch Arden" is some miserable scamp who deliberately shirks his duties and deserts wife and children in cold blood. He has no other idea or intention than to escape his obligations, and he does not care what privation is suffered as long as he is free of the immediate responsibility. Desertion of a family ought to be made a penitentiary offense, and instead of fooling away any compassion on the man who returns at the end of ten or fifteen years, to find his children grown and his successor installed, he should be clapped into the nearest jail and made to give an account of himself, and if his family has been dependent on public relief he should be compelled to refund double the amount to the community. There are occasional cases where a man is found to be mentally deranged and confined to an insane asylum, but in the majority of instances these disappearing gentry just betake themselves to a neighboring State or county, where they pose as unattached, have a good time amongst the girls, and not infrequently marry again, without a hint of their previous obligations. Even in such disasters as those of Galveston or Johnstown, where the whole community is practically annihilated, there is not one chance in a hundred thousand that, where half an effort is made, people who survive need lose trace of each other. In sentimentalizing over these deliberate deserters it is well to bear in mind that the original Enoch Arden was detained against his will and efforts to return. When he came back and found Annie married and happy with Philip he did not burst in upon the quiet household and precipitate a scene. On the contrary, he left them in peace, and had his strength permitted he would have gone away again without being recognized. The modern Enoch is an egotistical brute and he needs stern discipline.

As to Literary Centres

A Harvard college professor recently remarked that the literary of the United States had moved from Boston to Philadelphia, whereupon one of our well-posted morning contemporaries editorially remarked that it was up to the professor to name a solitary literary light of the city of Penn. Just by way of a starter, there might be mentioned Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, Owen Wister, Dr. Solis-Cohen and Mr. Harrison Morris. If Boston claims her sons wherever she finds them, Philadelphia can lay her hand on the shoulder of Richard Harding Davis, whose mother, Rebecca Harding Davis, was a writer of note before the callow editor conned his alphabet, and while we are about it there is another Davis, a brother of Richard, who also inherits a share of the family faculty. Their father was, and if he still survives probably is yet an editor of some note. The trouble with Philadelphia, as with this city, is in ignoring, if not disparaging the work of her own citizens. There is always more or less newspaper gush, which makes for nothing, but as Owen Wister has put it, "When a Bostonian is told that a fellow citizen has distinguished himself he replies, 'Quite natural,' but if a Philadelphian is told that another Philadelphian has done anything out of common his comment is, 'Quite impossible.'" In sober truth, there are no literary centres, in the sense that one locality is a better stimulus than another to literary work. There may be publishing centres, and in all large cities there are coteries of literary workers, just as there are trades unions, or athletic clubs, or social organizations. The newcomer may gain more or less reputation for himself by striking out on a new line of work, describing some feature of metropolitan life which is as old as the life itself, and unnoted by those who see it every day, but there is nothing in the air of Boston, New York, Philadelphia or any other locality which will supply or stimulate the literary microbe. The difficulty with the average journalist is not lack of inspiration or environment, but lack of industry and application—need of what Trollope used to say was the strongest incentive to literary labor, a good chunk of cobbler's wax in the seat of the writing chair. It is not so much the atmosphere of the "literary centre" which stimulates the wanderer from the Pacific coast when he strikes the pavements of New York and surprises his erstwhile cronies by his spurts of activity, but the very same quality which every teacher recognizes in the meek studiousness of the new pupil—before he has made the acquaintance of the rest of the boys.

On Leading One's Own Life

BY HARRY COWELL.

It is true to triteness that Life is a fine art—the supreme fine art; that other arts, love-making, music, literature, painting, and the like, are but subordinate parts of it—exist for its sake; that man's main business here is to live; that the end of life is to be largely, intensely, beautifully alive.

Equally true, if not equally trite, is the corollary, that in this art, also, originality is of all things most desirable and delightful. The difficulty of being original has always been overestimated: it is easy enough to be original, but it is hard to be original and right. However, in these days of unendurable imitation, to be original is to be right.

Like the monotonous succession of sheep getting through a gap, the spectacle of passing men induces sleep. Now the effect of a man upon his fellows ought to be far other than soporific; a man should keep one wonderfully awake, arousing one's curiosity, charming one by his variety, by his "peculiar difference" cultured and brought to perfection.

To lead another's life, no matter how good he may be; to think another's thoughts, no matter how clever he may be; to act according to convention, is to be a machine. To act according to conviction is to be a man.

He who leads his own life must think for himself; no man or majority may be brains for him—or conscience. And the value of thinking for oneself is not to be estimated by the correctness of the conclusions arrived at. To think is to be intellectually alive. Moreover, standards of conduct change: criteria come under the law of evolution; the flux carries them away and buries them forever in the ocean of things outgrown. And this much at least of truth is in the Socratic doctrine that sin is ignorance, mere want of knowledge: few men do wrong on principle. Systematic sinners are rare. Most men bungle upon evil.

Regarding the life of each man as his contribution to art, the critic finds, not a variety of masterpieces, as is meet, but failure after failure; the alleged poetry doggerel, the painting a daub. Life by life he examines ten thousand, and Impartiality declares them to be formless, without style; not even a good grotesque or farce among the lot.

In order to make of the scanty three score years and ten a work of 'art to match, let us say, an opus of Beethoven, one needs to be born with a genius for living. How few of us have even talent!

What little natural ability to lead a new life—a life of his own—an infant may have by birth, soon dies of disuse. Originality is accounted irregularity, irregularity sin; and sin must be suppressed. Conform! Herein, the child is assured, is the alpha and omega of virtue. To think his own thoughts, not those of his parents; to lead his own life, not theirs, is insolent rebellion and calls for the rod. And yet, a rebel (social or political) is but an unsuccessful revolutionist, and a revolutionist is but a successful rebel. And yet, the great and good men of the past whom the child is taught to imitate, were great and good chiefly because they refused to conform, to be imitators, but insisted on being at all times and under all circumstances themselves. The only way to be a true disciple of a great man is by not being a disciple of his or any man's.

I hold it evidence of the greatness of Agassiz's teaching that he made such good observers and thinkers of those who studied with him that they all came to believe in the theory of evolution which was to the end discredited of the master. A petty teacher would have foisted his own opinions upon his pupils.

To lead a second-hand existence; to be body for the brains of others, to be a pauper in personality; to let dead men direct your life, or rather, prolong a pitiful, pseudo-life of their own through you, cheating you out of your "one chance"; to allow a Majority god to remake you in its own mediocre likeness; in short, to be other than yourself for anybody—is not this to insult your soul?

"But," it will be objected, "it is easy enough to talk: 'Talk is cheap.'" Not all talk. Some is very dear indeed. It has cost countless days of incessant labor and many wakeful nights. A man may have paid for his speech the price of friendship and the blessings of those bound to him by ties of blood. He may have given for his words the good will of the world into which he was born, and have his name written on those delicate shells—the ears of polite society.

Montaigne quotes Epictetus as saying that a man has nothing that is properly his own but the use of his opinions. This sole piece of real property that is his by birth man too frequently sells for a mess of pottage.

There is a friend of mine who is accounted a very poor man, but there is one luxury which he ever allows himself—a luxury which many a rich man cannot afford—that of thinking aloud the thought that is true to him and of "honoring his truth by living it"—of leading his own life. Him I envy.

I well know that in all things we cannot live our own lives; for the true life is not to be lived alone, but needs a whole world with us, not against us. None the less, in the inner world of the spirit, we may at all times live according to our convictions, making meanwhile protests that are also prophecies in the outer world of the flesh.

Experiments cost dearly. To lead one's own life is a luxury. One must be prepared to pay Fate her price. But to have lived is worth everything.

The Saunterer

Pillsbury on the Pay Roll

The adroit Mr. E. S. Pillsbury is once more laughing in his sleeve at his enemies, for he has been reappointed chief counsel for the Santa Fe Railroad Company. The reappointment came as a general surprise to a few people familiar with a certain compact under which, it is said, the crafty Mr. Pillsbury lost the job to which he has been restored. It is an interesting story, and one that two very prominent officials of the Santa Fe system would prefer to have suppressed. The compact was entered into at the time the company was engaged in pushing certain legislation authorizing the lease of China Basin to the corporation. Mr. Pillsbury had shortly before been appointed attorney for the railroad on the recommendation of a certain statesman who believed that the attorney enjoyed confidential relations which would enable him to do business with the Harbor Commission. But the legislation was being blocked and the Santa Fe officials were becoming very much alarmed. If the legislation did not go through they could not get the lease, and it was very important to them that the opposition be withdrawn.

The Solemn Compact

The situation became so critical that President Ripley came out from the East to exercise his emollient influence, and he managed to arrange a conference with the men who manipulated affairs in the Legislature. Both Mr. Ripley and his assistant, Mr. Payson attended the conference, and it took but a very short time to enlighten them on the subject of the opposition to their bill.

"What is the objection to the bill?" was the first question asked by the President of the Santa Fe.

"It is against the interests of the Republican party," was the reply.

"How does it affect the party?" asked Ripley.

"It's fathered by Mr. E. S. Pillsbury, and he's busily engaged in trying to disrupt the local organization."

Thereupon Mr. Ripley grew wise. It was explained to him that certain members of the Legislature were against everything that Attorney Pillsbury was for. The bill was not objectionable, but Mr. Pillsbury was. Mr. Ripley was very sorry, but he did not see how he could discharge Pillsbury at that critical stage. He needed Pillsbury to handle the Harbor Commission. But, and this is where the compact came in, Mr. Pillsbury would be discharged as soon as the lease was signed and delivered. So said Mr. Ripley, and Mr. Payson bowed approvingly.

The Politicians Indignant

Now the people who object to Pillsbury's pernicious activity in politics, and who regard him as one of the shiftiest and most artful members of the bar, assert that it was solemnly agreed by both Ripley and Payson not only that Pillsbury would be discharged, but that he would never again be employed by the Santa Fe Company. He was discharged, but upon the death of Chief Counsel Sterry of Los Angeles, a short time ago, he was reappointed, and much to the disgust and indignation of the men who say they took the word of both Payson and Ripley. The leading Republican politicians are very much incensed over the appointment of Pillsbury because they believe he is anxious to organize a political bureau, and they think that as the attorney for the Santa Fe his influence, which is now far from small, will be greatly augmented. He is now drawing retainers from more corporations than any other lawyer in the city, and his prestige as a manipulator is great. He belongs to that class of attorneys who are employed in big cases not on account of their great legal ability but for their talent for making the proper connections. In other words, he knows the ropes. No doubt Ripley and Payson think it important that they should have such a man on their staff, but perhaps when they have some lobbying to do in the future they will not find it so easy to conciliate the opposition.

Merely a Matter of Expediency

People who permit themselves to be tantalized by their curiosity are enduring exquisite mental agony these days because they cannot account for certain happenings of great political interest. For instance, they are at a loss to explain to their own satisfaction the Chronicle's sudden and unexpected assault on Mayor Schmitz, and they are exceedingly perplexed over the Call's repudiation of Ruef. It was popularly supposed that Mr. Schmitz won the everlasting esteem of Mr. De Young by constituting him It for the reception to Roosevelt, and it was believed that Mr. Ruef was in the habit of taking orders in the Call office. The fact is that neither Mr. De Young nor Mr. Spreckels ever considered himself under obligations to either Schmitz or Ruef. On the contrary, the obligations were all on the other side, but just what they were the public will never know. Suffice it that the Chronicle and Call have been exceedingly kind to the Mayor and his mentor. Both enjoyed immunity from criticism for a long time, and they should have been content with the reaping of one harvest. The proprietors of the Call and Chronicle have entered into a combination to secure control of the local Republican machine, and, incidentally, of the municipal government, and it seemed to them that Schmitz and Ruef were conspiring to upset their plans. Thereupon they resolved to force them into retirement by telling the truth about them.

to some of the politicians whom the presidential aspirant is anxious to conciliate. Mr. Murphy is one of the best-known and most able political writers on the Coast. During his long experience on the Examiner he has become acquainted with every politician of consequence in the State, as well as with many of the leading statesmen of national repute. Like all successful political reporters, he has made it his inflexible rule to maintain inviolate the confidences reposed in him, and the consequence has been that politicians have never feared to trust him. At the same time, he has always been loyal to his paper, and his discussions of political affairs have always been noted for their accuracy as well as their breeziness. At times he has scored the rogues and the hypocrites of both parties, and it was at the instigation of some of them, who, I am sorry to say, are at present enjoying immunity from Examiner criticism, that "Blinker" was temporarily silenced. There was a time when Mr. Hearst would scorn to heed the suggestions of a rank outsider regarding such a matter as the assignment of a reporter, but that was before he was obsessed with the notion that he was a presidential possibility. And, by the way, there is nothing that a newspaper man so bitterly resents as outside interference, and I have never known of a case of such interference that did not have its sequel.

Tevis Treated as a Tramp

Fancy one of our young millionaires suspected of being a tramp and threatened with being kicked off private premises! That is what happened to young Will Tevis on the shores of Lake Tahoe one balmy evening a week ago. The Tevis home is a short distance from the Tallac property, and that is where Will Tevis roughs it during the summer months. And he is a very picturesque spectacle in his outing costume. He wears an old slouch hat which he pulls down over his ears; a dust-stained sweater, khaki trousers with a rag-wrapping round his calves. In this garb he visited the Tallac House at dusk one evening, and was intercepted by a watchman, who roughly ordered him off the premises.

"I'm not doing any harm," said Tevis, who knew immediately that he was suspected of being a tramp, and who wanted to see how far the watchman would go.

"Well, you're not going to get a chance to do any harm," said the watchman.

"But——"

"Never mind, now; you just scoot. We've had enough of your kind of people around here, and if you don't git I'll kick you off the premises."

When Tevis revealed his identity the man started to apologize, but the young millionaire wouldn't listen to apologies. "I think you're a good watchman," he said; "come and have a drink!"

The Premature Mr. Harvey

Mr. George Harvey, the editor of Harper's Weekly, is such an enterprising journalist that he insists upon discussing current topics just as soon as they become current, if not sooner. This avidity for pouncing on live topics of the day as soon as they emerge from the womb of Time was responsible last week for an amusing faux pas. Mr. Harvey grew weary of waiting for Pope Leo to die, and felt certain that if he did not die before the last page of copy was sent to the printer he would surely pass away while the paper was between the press and the people; and so he resolved to anticipate, and, as a consequence, he became absurdly premature. Under the caption, "The Next Pope" he discussed the conclave of cardinals as though it were already in session. "Seldom," he wrote, "in the history of the Papacy has the outcome of a conclave been awaited with more anxiety by zealous Catholics. * * * As the present number of the weekly will reach the eyes of many readers before the choice of a Pope is made," etc. He was undoubtedly right about that. It reached the eyes of his readers even before the conclave was held; indeed, even before the expediency of a conclave was apparent.

The Cardinal's Foresight

The Pope was never worried over the reports of his death. He often quoted the Italian proverb, "Reports of one's death add years to one's life." Some years ago, when he was operated upon, it was reported that he was dying, and Cardinal Oreglio di Stefano was summoned to the Vatican. Like Mr. Harvey, he, too, was premature, for he took with him his little mallet, with which, in his official capacity as Cardinal Chamberlain, he would be required, according to custom, to tap on the head of the dead Pope. When Leo recovered he heard the story and he thanked the Cardinal for his foresight. He also presented him with a little gold hammer "as a token of sincere admiration, and a souvenir of my recovery."

Flubdub From Rome

It appeared from the padded columns of the dailies during the illness of the Pope that the newspaper correspondents were taken into the confidence of the Sacred College, and regaled with information concerning the innermost thoughts, purposes and ambitions of the Cardinals. The correspondents told us that secrecy was observed on all sides, that the death-room was carefully guarded, and that at times no authentic information could be had as to the dying man's condition, but in the same breath they gave most minute description of all that was occurring and even quoted the Pope and members of his household on matters pertaining to church polity. It is evident that competition in the chase for news was quite brisk in the neighborhood of the Vatican, and that the correspondents had to do a lot of faking to sustain their reputation. Their correspondence bristled with palpable inaccuracies and curious contradictions. Of course the fact is that the news channels of the Vatican are not accessible to every scribbler in Rome, and as a consequence the newspaper men were constrained to give reign to their imagination, which in some instances had been stimulated by Marie Corelli, Hall Caine and other sensational novelists of the back-stairs. And by the way, it was surprising to find that Mr. Hearst should call into requisition the pen of Hall Caine for a eulogy on Pope Leo. Mr. Hearst is after votes these days and recently he captured the Jews by the great interest that he took in the Kishinef affair. Why should he seek to alienate the Catholics by hiring Hall Caine to write about the "secret canvassing of the Sacred College in favor of the succession of this simple Carmelite monk or that fashionable Roman prelate; the intrigue and the counterintrigue," etc.?

A Priest's Denunciation

Hall Caine's flubdub is of the same flavor as a great deal of the absurd rot with which the dailies have reeked since the fatal illness of Leo was first announced. It is all of a character highly disgusting to Catholics. Two weeks ago Father Grant, in the pulpit of St. Brigid's church in this city, took occasion to denounce the yellow journals for the falsehoods they have published, and he remarked that any Catholic with common sense knew that the Cardinals were not engaged in supplying information concerning the private affairs of the church to representatives of the sensational press. The newspapers have represented that from the first day of the Pope's illness the members of the Sacred College were engaged in discussing the question of succession. They were pictured as a band of cold-blooded, hungry politicians, unaffected by the dying struggle of the venerable pontiff, but intent only upon the honors and emoluments to be scrambled for after his death. According to the sensational and absurd press the whole world mourned the passing of that kind and gentle old man, and the only place in which selfishness was stimulated by his approaching death was the Vatican where he was surrounded by the companions of a lifetime, the men most familiar with his virtues, and all but one of whom were indebted to him for the exalted position they occupied. The world moves on, and times, manners and customs have changed since the days when even the Vatican was tainted by the impurities that flowed through Europe, but the enlightened press of the twentieth century has not yet made the discovery. The yellow journals believe that the Catholic Church is the only institution which has stood still; that because there have been wicked clergymen, all clergymen are still knaves. But there are people who know something about the Catholic Church and its clergymen who believe that there are many members of the Sacred College who have no desire to wear the tiara; humble monks who would prefer to occupy a cell in a monastery than the most sumptuous apartment in the Vatican.

Who Will Be Our Next Pope?

A very close student of the present situation at the Vatican tells me that really only three men are likely to be considered available for the high office of Pontiff: Cardinal Rampolla, who has so long been Secretary of State; Cardinal Serafino Vanutelli, formerly nuncio at Vienna, and Cardinal Gotti, formerly general of the Carmelites. Of these he thinks Cardinal Gotti has the best chance for, unlike the others, he represents no party in the church and no fixed and determined policy regarding outside nations. He is a monk whose austere life has been devoted to reorganizing and building up those religious orders which are one of the chief bulwarks of the Holy Church. Besides he was the favorite of Leo XIII. In church circles it is not believed that the Sacred College will be influenced to any extent by any of the Great Powers. Some fifteen years ago when Leo XIII fell seriously ill, and a conclave seemed imminent, Prince Bismarck opened diplomatic relations with foreign Powers with the object of controlling the election of a Pope. His plan failed. This privilege to veto was a prerogative imposed on the Church in the Middle Ages when, surrounded by nations at war with one another, it was compelled to seek aid of one monarch and then another in order to protect its temporalities. It was a concession not definitely granted and was never included in any treaty or concordat.

Leo XIII Blocks the Schemers

The world's political affairs have changed greatly since the Middle Ages. When the Holy See, some twenty years ago, appealed to the Catholic Powers to take action to induce the Italian crown to restore to the papacy its former possessions and met with a refusal, the Vatican decided that Paris, Vienna and Madrid had forfeited whatever rights they might have acquired by custom and tradition of exercising a veto at conclaves and that the veto power had ceased to exist when the Catholic Powers recognized the seizure of Rome and of the Papal States by the King of Italy. How firmly resolved the Papacy is to prevent any kind of interference either by the Italian government or by other foreign Powers may be gathered from the new rules promulgated by Leo XIII to insure the independence of the conclave. According to these the Cardinals present in Rome at the time of the demise of the Pontiff are directed to assemble at once in order to fix the place and date of the conclave. If there appears to them to be the least reason to apprehend interference on the part of outside Powers they are authorized to proceed then and there to elect a Pope, not even to wait for the arrival of foreign Cardinals from abroad or for the obsequies of the dead Pontiff.

Poet Miller Sings of Legs

A Californian who was visiting New York entered a fashionable restaurant one day, and, scanning the bill of fare, espied a somewhat costly dish with the title "plat du jour." He ordered it to be brought, and on tasting it what was his amazement to find it nothing but plebeian tripe and onions disguised with a fine name and plenty of seasoning. Something akin was the sensation I experienced on reading Joaquin Miller's new poem, "As It Was in the Beginning." I fail to discern in it that note of sad sincerity which some of the critics have discovered. From its contumacious cover design to its so-called "prefatory postscript" it seems to me in the main a bold and blatant effort to take advantage of the present agitation over "race suicide." It is the poet's longest attempt in verse, and though it "sings in spots," to quote Joaquin himself, it shows marks of haste, carelessness and a desire to strike while the iron is hot; in other words, to get into print before public attention is called to some newer sensation. "As It Was in the Beginning" is the Odyssey of a native son and daughter. The girl is of the poster type, and is as unreal as most poster ladies. We learn that she had "puppy hair," "proud and ample lips" and "a wide sweet mouth." Furthermore, unlike the Queen of Spain, she had legs, and we are treated to a picture of them:

> What ankles, legs, what everything
> That makes great woman great and good—
> That makes for noblest womanhood!
> Such legs as mount the steeps of morn,
> Such legs as love, not lust, may share,
> Such legs as God has shaped to bear
> The weight of ages, worlds unborn;
> Such legs as Lesbian shrines revealed
> When comely, longing mothers kneeled;
> Such legs as Milo dared to hew
> And all the clean world longed to view;
> Such legs as Millais loved to draw
> When painting tall Greek girls at play;
> Such legs as blind old Homer saw,
> As Marlowe knew but yesterday.

It was Leighton, by the way, and not Millais, who painted Greek girls at play.

Off to the Klondike

The native son is an "outdoor Adam" who is several times described as "clean." I can not understand why, in writers who are so insistent upon this epithet, the opposite quality is the one usually suggested. When the story opens the young man is soliloquizing upon the origin of the world and the beauties and benefits of silence:

> For, storm or calm, or sun or shade,
> Fair Silence never truth betrayed;
> For, ocean-deep or dappled sky,
> Loved Silence never told a lie.

The hero has made up his mind to go to the Klondike, but the heroine is loth to let him:

> The while she choking, sobbing, said,
> "Then here for all our poppy days,
> Here, here the parting of the ways?"

The young lady is unwilling to emulate the spouse of Ulysses:

> Penelope! Penelope!
> Of all fool tales in historie,
> I think this thing the foolishest.

When the young man persists in his purpose she flounces into the house exclaiming, "I can not and I will not wait." That this is not idle threat subsequent events prove, for she follows him to the North and rescues him from death by her care and attention. Later we discover the pair enjoying a cruise in the South Seas, apparently without a chaperon, but all's well that ends well, for a wedding closes the last canto. The real poetry in the poem is to be found in the descriptions of the cold and silence of the Arctic. Miller writes from personal experience, and his descriptions, though turgid, ring true.

Just a Bit Risque

The episode in Canto X would hardly be suitable for Sunday school reading, and in fact has little or nothing to do with the flow of the story. It appears to be lugged in just to show how risque the poet dared to be in a good cause. The sub-story is related by the lover to his fiancee, remember. Most well-conducted girls would be offended, but then Miriam had already thrown her bonnet over the windmills, so perhaps she was not in a position to object. He tells her "The night grew warm and very warm, and warm her warm full-bosomed form!" Again, "He was so warm, so very warm." And again, "The warm land lay as in a swoon," and a few lines further on, "How warm the world was and how wise," and yet again, "How warm the garden was, how warm with life, with love in any form!" And when the crickets are described, "Their little world was warm

> Because each had a lover there,
> Because they loved and did not care.

And in the next stanza but one, "The very garden wall was warm." But enough. This will do for three pages. Decidedly we are in the tropics. The theme of "As It Was in the Beginning" is not new. Many a poet has sought it before now, beautifully, nobly and chastely. But Joaquin Miller does not sing it nobly or chastely. Perhaps he fancies that he does. Notwithstanding his bombast and trickery of diction, in spite of his banality of phrase and tawdriness of image, the Poet of the Sierras is able to impart to many of his lines a singing quality that causes them to sound better than they are. His verse is like a river that rages on in flood, carrying with it mud and rubbish, while here there flows into it some pure rill, fresh and crystal clear. The book is published by A. M. Robertson, San Francisco. The conception of the cover is execrable, but, on the whole, it agrees very well with the contents.

An Overcoat Episode

Elbert Hubbard, the Prince of Fakers, who recently visited this city and who was entertained by Miller, has, since his return East, written that the Poet of the Sierras was the author of the finest poem ever written by an American. But what Fra Elbertus doesn't know about poetry would fill a Roycroft library. Miller has written beautiful poetry but Hubbard couldn't point out its beauties. However he has caused talk and Miller is once more bathed in the limelight. I am reminded of a story of the poet's experience in Washington when he was short of money as he was of fame. He was asked to dinner by a literary chap to meet some literary people who would be of some use to him. He accepted the invitation but he was in a dilemma because he had no dress coat nor could he afford to buy one. That was before he adopted the top-boots and cow-hides, but even at that early day he had a "smelly" bearskin overcoat, and he decided to wear it, and on the plea that he suffered from the Eastern cold, keep it on during dinner. When he made the explanation to his host the latter said "Certainly" and ordered more coal in the furnace. Dinner was served and though the room was hot as a conservatory the poet still complained of cold and kept on his overcoat. Dinner progressed and, warmed with food and wine, to say nothing of the hairy coat, Miller thought he would die. His face became redder and redder, but he talked brilliantly. At last, when the poet looked as though he were about to explode, the host asked over the 'steenth bottle, "Now tell us, Miller—of course you have some reason—why did you insist on wearing that coat?" Miller, his tongue loosened with wine, told them the plain truth. How they cheered, those fellows cheered his courage for coming at all, and his frankness in telling them the truth! He was the toast and made the hit of the evening. It was great. From that day Miller thought it paid to don eccentric dress and he has never garbed himself like any one else since.

Speaking of Genius

Apropos of Mr. Hoffman's clever poem in last week's Town Talk on the affectations of genius, I am reminded of a luncheon given during Mr. Harriman's recent visit in San Francisco. William Keith, the artist, who is a good friend of Mr. Herrin, was invited by him to the luncheon. John Muir was invited too. Both Keith and Muir say that they thought it was to be a little informal thing for four, with Herrin and Harriman making up the quartet. When they arrived at the appointed place they found Mr. and Mrs. Will Crocker, Mary Crocker Harrison, Mrs. Easton and a number of other beautifully gowned women. The luncheon was a function for twenty-five or more and Muir was in his tramping clothes while Keith wore an old gray suit, not guiltless of paint, and with a flowing tie that had seen better days. Both the geniuses pretended to feel dreadfully over it—though really it was very interesting—it showed where creative genius left off and financial genius began.

Boys Emulate Magee and Hobson

A few months ago when the dailies told the thrilling story of the perilous trip made by Lieutenant Hobson and Tom Magee to the summit of the precipitous Half Dome of the Yosemite, the denizens of the valley were sceptical. They had not seen the young men accomplish the feat and they would not believe they had done so. So though they were being lionized by their friends in town for having climbed the treacherous wall of the high cliff, the old-timers in the valley regarded the story as a hoax. Nobody had seen them go up and nobody had seen them come down, so the yarn was rejected as the fabrication of two glory-seekers eager to have their courage sung. But the sceptical denizens of the valley have been convinced, and the two heroes are indebted to two boys, neither of whom is over sixteen years of age, for corroboration of their sensational story. The boys are the sons of the late attorney Gibson who had a hand in the framing of the charter. They made the ascent of the Half Dome on Saturday two weeks ago and remained on the summit all night. They built a fire that was seen by scores of campers in the valley. The following day three other lads, friends of the Gibsons, also made the perilous journey up the perpendicular cliff, bringing food to the hungry youngsters, and the five returned together. They reported that they had found evidence of the visit of Magee and Hobson. The first person known to have scaled that cliff was an adventurous Scotch tourist who went up by means of pegs which he imbedded in the rock. He carried a rope which he fastened to a peg on the summit, and after that many people made the trip with the assistance of the rope, but in time it rotted and thereafter nobody essayed the perilous journey until Hobson and Magee pioneered it once more.

Explained His Mishap

When W. H. Selback, who attacked the three nuns in Market street last week, arrived in the patrol wagon at the city prison, his face was somewhat battered and he had the appearance of a man who had met several rather heavy jolts somewhere. A curious man who happened to be standing by the sergeant's desk while Selback was being entered on the book asked the latter if anything had happened him on the trip. "Nope," he answered sheepily, "I guess I sort of fell when I got into the wagon." A reporter was standing by and he casually asked, "Who brought him in?" "Policeman Herlihy," said some one. The reporter grinned. "That accounts for the—the jolts," he said, "it was Herlihy; only Herlihy."

Prepared to Hold His Own

This same policeman Herlihy has had his adventures on the force. He is an active, athletic fellow, fond of a mix-up, with a reputation for being conscientiously strenuous in the discharge of his duty in cases like that of the wanton attack on the nuns. During the teamsters' strike he was given the detail of scouting in plain clothes among the strikers and looking after the safety of scabs or any other citizen in jeopardy. One afternoon he was followed and set upon as a suspected scab by several men supposed to be in sympathy with the strikers. At once there was a lovely fight. Lieutenant Price and a policeman heard the din and ran up to rescue the hapless scab. In a jiffy it was hard to tell which was policeman, which was scab and which was striker in the squirming, kicking, pounding, smashing heap of humanity. In the midst of it all up ran half a dozen policemen. They regarded the tumbled mix-up of men, anxious to find head or tail to it and pull the worst one out of the fray. In a minute or two they observed that one of the hardest fighters had a length of gas pipe and that every time he could smash a head down went the head. With one accord the six big policemen drew their clubs and threw themselves upon the fighter with the gas pipe. It took considerable thumping to quiet him and make him understand, above the excitement, the shouting and the uproar, that he had better be quiet for he was in the hands of the police. But at last they got away his gas pipe and dragged him out from under the strikers and the others. It was Herlihy; only Herlihy.

Our Ambitious Pedagogues

Those benighted teachers who are foolish enough to spend their vacation attending the summer school at Berkeley are meeting with the same sort of encouragement and assistance from Professor Herrick that their predecessors encountered last summer. One would suppose that people with sense enough to teach school would also have sense enough to spend their vacations as far from school and everything connected with it as they could go in the time at their disposal. Teaching school, of all the occupations ever followed by man or woman, is the most nerve-racking and exhausting. And yet, after spending ten months in close attendance on class rooms, teachers may be beguiled by theorists into believing that instead of spending their summer in complete relaxation, resting mentally and physically, they should keep up the weary mental friction. Teachers are altogether too prone to stick to the shop. As a rule they talk nothing but methods, percentages, averages and classes. Even at the summer resorts they hunt in packs, and whenever two of them encounter each other there is an impromptu institute. No doubt the attendants at Berkeley are looking forward to an opportunity for leaving the schoolroom, and evidently they are being beguiled by reports of best sellers and boom authors, and the fabulous sums to be made by "engaging in literature," but literature is like everything else; some succeed where others fail, and it is fairly safe, in reading of the enormous financial returns, to move the decimal a point or two in places to the left.

Fiction About Profits

In spite of all that is circulated concerning the phenomenal sales and the income derived from the most successful books, it is worth noting that when the inventory of an author's estate is made in the probate court, it invariably presents a small value. To mention a few of those recently deceased, Harold Fredericks and Stephen Crane left practically nothing; Paul Leicester Ford was reputed to be many times a millionaire, yet the bulk of his estate was what he had inherited from his father; Bret Harte left almost nothing; Sir Walter Besant, T. B. Blackmore and Emil Zola were in moderate circumstances only, and the principal assets left by Frank Norris are the problematic royalties from the future sale of his books. Three years ago a local author placed a novel with an Eastern firm. It was well received by critics and passed through two editions, and was reported to be selling well. When the final adjustment was made between author and publisher, there was a balance of one dollar and a half on the wrong side of the ledger, which, however, the firm kindly volunteered to carry on their books, trusting that future sales would wipe it out. So much for the probable profits of a literary venture. On the other hand, as to the infallibility of professors in the matter of determining what is literature, and what is literary style, Pierre Loti says that when he was attending the academy the one subject in which he was an unmitigated failure in the estimation of those who were supposed to know, was composition in any form, and there are others who could give similar testimony. There is only one board of arbitration in this matter, and that is composed of the editors of periodicals and the readers for publishing houses. To be sure, there is a final court of appeal in the reading public, but it depends on the editors and publishers whether the reading body ever has the opportunity to judge. One thing is certain, however, and that is that there will not be any sudden increase in the ranks of local authors from the attendants of summer schools. There are one or two subjects which cannot be mastered in a day, and the art of writing a successful book is amongst them.

A Check for Mrs. Norris

Apropos the estate of Frank Norris, I am informed that his widow received a check the other day from the publishers of "The Pit" for something over fifty thousand dollars, the aggregate amount of the royalties earned by that work. This report savors of the usual book-booming yarn. When Frank Norris died there was a rumor to the effect that he had left his widow almost penniless, his profits on "The Octopus" not having been large. The sale of "The Pit" must have been phenomenally large if that check was really received. However, the report did not come from the publishing house. Charles Norris, Frank's younger brother by several years, recently graduated from Berkeley and has already accepted a readership under Doubleday, Page & Co., the publishers, who backed the dead novelist.

A Mother's Will

James Burnett and his wife, who was Miss Viola Piercy, have returned from their wedding trip in the Yellowstone, and they have reported to their friends that they had a glorious time. I hear, by the way, that the haste which marked the Piercy-Burnett nuptials was due to the fact that the bride wasn't quite sure that her grandmother, Mrs. Dunphy, would approve of the match. Mrs. Dunphy is an eccentric woman who has always been accustomed to having her own way in everything, and she has been especially dictatorial in matters affecting the heart interests of her children. It would probably have been better for them had she not been so whimsical and exercised so much authority, but at any rate there have been many dramatic and tragic episodes in the lives of her offspring. And incidentally it is remarkable what a lot of mystery has surrounded the house of the dead cattle king, and to what an extent speculation has been rife as to the cause of various complications in which certain members have been involved. Concerning the aged widow little has been known since the death of her husband. She keeps in seclusion and many of the intimate friends of the beautiful Miss Jennie Dunphy have never seen her mother. Her meals are sent to her room, but not because of ill health, for she sallies forth periodically to engage in some laborious housework.

Because She Objected

The marriage of Mrs. Flood, the elder Dunphy daughter, was a very unhappy one and ended in a divorce. The marriage of another daughter to Sam Piercy was vigorously opposed on all sides and the death of those young people was followed by a bitter contest over the child. Jim Dunphy had an unfortunate marital experience in his early life, and some years ago he became the fiance of Elida Wilbur. The marriage was delayed because of the opposition of Mrs. Dunphy, it was said, and that young woman died after lingering in a trance for many months. The engagement of Miss Jennie Dunphy to Bob Grayson was frequently rumored, but their marriage was objectionable because the young man was not a Catholic. He became a Catholic and then there was some other objection. Mr. Grayson died suddenly and alone. Jimmy Dunphy took unto himself a second wife recently, but his mother has never seen the bride. Miss Piercy very sensibly made her choice of a husband without consulting anybody.

Still Unattached

If Katherine Dillon fulfills her intention expressed in letters to her San Francisco friends, she will be back here in September. Her new house will doubtless be ready for occupancy in the early winter, and then Miss Dillon will entertain. She has bought all sorts of beautiful things during her travels and her new home will be full of objets d'art. It might be well for our heiress-hunting youths to bear in mind that Miss Dillon is still in the market. Fred Greenwood tried his luck with her many times, even pursuing the game to Honolulu, but fate was unkind to him. The "man in the navy" that has been mentioned so many times as being a favored suitor of the buxom heiress has up to date been as mysterious as the mythical Mrs. Harris of Sairey Gamp. If any noblemen got in their innings while Miss Dillon was in "furrin' parts," she has never breathed to even her mother whether such were the case. Miss Dillon is a big catch in more senses than one. Nature has molded her on a generous scale, she has a large, kind heart, and a plump bank-roll. She owns a block of real estate.

Why Lackaye Was Surprised

Wilton Lackaye, of the Amelia Bingham company, has a nimble wit which has won him distinction off the stage as great as that which he enjoys on the other side of the footlights. Unlike Clyde Fitch he is epigrammatic in a spontaneous way, and his bon mots are never forced. A few days ago he visited a friend in the Examiner editorial rooms, and sat down for a long chat, but they had not been talking very long when the editor remarked that he would have to break away.

"I have to attend the council," he said.

"What council?" asked Lackaye in a tone of surprise.

"The Examiner council," was the reply. The heads of departments meet every afternoon to discuss the news of the day and arrange everything for the coming issue."

"Well, I'm surprised," exclaimed Lackaye; "I never would suspect that the Examiner was published premeditatedly."

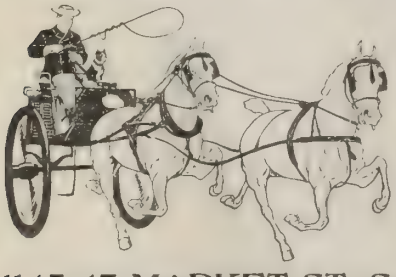
The Professional Juror

The professional juror has become an important factor in the administration of justice in this city; also in the perpetration of injustice. In the civil courts he renders valuable assistance to the attorneys of some of the big corporations. It is extremely difficult for a poor widow to recover damages for the death of her husband in a railroad accident these days, because the attorney for the corporation has a list of all the men who serve as jurors from year to year, and he knows the sentiments of each of them before the impanelment of a jury is begun. As each talesman enters the box the attorney consults his little book and studies the "dope," just like the race track gambler who relies on the form sheet. It strikes you as improbable that such a system would be tolerated, but if you doubt that it exists ask any lawyer in San Francisco. He will not only tell you that it does, but he will also inform you that the courts are responsible for it. And it does not exist in the civil courts only. There are professional jurors in the criminal courts, men who are eager to serve at two dollars a day, and determine the fate of unfortunates charged with crime. And it is believed in criminal circles that these men cultivate the friendship of the District Attorney to insure themselves steady employment. To cultivate it properly they heed the appeals of the prosecuting officer. It is perhaps fortunate for society that these professional jurors are ever ready to punish the guilty, but the principles upon which our law is founded are not best subserved by men who are eager to earn two dollars a day by assisting the city's prosecuting officer in making a record.

Treadwell's Query



The foregoing is by way of preface to a story of an incident which occurred in Judge Dunne's court some days ago. A jury was being impaneled for the trial of a man on a charge of burglary. A. B. Treadwell, the ex-police judge, who has a lively sense of humor, was the attorney for the defence. Treadwell has spent many years in criminal court circles, and he is familiar with all the ways that are dark in the Hall of Justice. He observed in the jury box one of the men who is known to habitues of the courts as a professional juror and he resolved to get rid of him, so he proceeded to question him with a view of eliciting an admission that would disqualify him. But in vain. Finally in desperation the attorney put this question:

"Do you thoroughly appreciate the difference between the presumption of innocence and two dollars a day?"

The bailiff had to rap violently for order in the court room.

The stork has once more visited the Eugene Lents, and for a second time a baby girl was the memento he left behind.

The Gray Vandals

The irrepressible Gray brothers, who have long been a source of great annoyance and anxiety to the goats and residents of Telegraph Hill, have I am informed purchased the castle on the summit and a goodly portion of the stately hill itself. So I presume they will be free to resume the destruction of that grand old eminence which adds so much to the picturesqueness of this city, and which affords delight to all lovers of the beautiful views to be had from its summit. There has lately been talk of the purchase of Telegraph Hill by capitalists, and making of it a handsome residence district. The whole of the North Beach district has lately been blossoming with mansions, and Telegraph Hill is certainly the choicest location at the northerly end of town, but its improvement would involve a considerable outlay. However its destruction should be averted even though it should be necessary for the city authorities to interpose and invoke the law of eminent domain. There surely should be some way of starting our cumbersome municipal machinery in motion to that end. Perhaps the ladies of the Sempervirens Club may think it worth their while to agitate such a project.

One of the Old Families

Elizabeth Leigh, who was married last week in Oakland, is a representative of one of California's oldest families. Her mother was one of the prettiest girls in this city when she married Wickham Leigh in 1861. She was Camille Bowie, daughter of Hamilton Bowie who, in his early life, was a duelist of note. Her uncle Dr. Augustus J. Bowie was one of the leading physicians of early days. Her mother, soon after becoming a widow, married William L. Higgins, a Southerner and a prominent politician.

She Called Them Hussies

Fashionable Fabiola Hospital of Oakland is in a state of eruption these days and all because the seven nurses in the senior class heard what Mrs. Remi Chabot said about them, or at any rate, what Mrs. Dunning said that Miss Chabot said about them. The trouble all arose when the main body of nurses rebelled against the rule of Miss Houghton, the head nurse. She was a little too strict and autocratic to please her subordinates, and they called on

Mrs. John Yule, the president of the hospital, and told her their troubles. At the same time they threatened to resign in a body if Miss Houghton was not deposed. The situation was critical. Miss Yule held a conference with Mrs. Chabot and Mrs. Dunning and told them of the uprising of the nurses. Thereupon, so the story goes, Mrs. Chabot exclaimed, "The hussies!" and she added, "If I'd been there I should have used my club and Kate would have helped me, too!" The Kate to whom she is said to have referred is her daughter, Mrs. Dunn. Such was the story that came to the ears of the nurses, and thereupon the members of the senior class announced their intention to resign. These nurses are representatives of some of the very finest families in Oakland, and they have many sympathizers who declare that it was an outrage to stigmatize respectable young women as "hussies." All Oakland society is taking an interest in the affair, and the controversy is becoming exceedingly acrimonious. The aristocrats of Oakland lack that repose that marks the caste of Vere de Vere. They fly into a passion on the slightest provocation.

Where the Paper Chasers Dwell

Recent happenings in San Rafael gave Town Talk's bard fresh inspiration, impelling him to add a few more jingles to his familiar lyric:

In the County of Marin, where all the paper chasers dwell
There's a region of excitement and it's known as San Rafael.
Though the streets are broad and shady and the ladies are demure
There is always fruit for scandal lurking somewhere, to be sure.
Be it murder, be it arson, or divorce or suicide,
Or the naughty automobile's more than statutory ride,
Or the gossip of a Baron living like a Teuton tribal
With a retinue of beauties—till he sued the press for libel.
All such breezy little items show significantly well
That there's always something doing in the town of San Rafael.

In the County of Marin, where all the paper chasers dwell
There's a newsy little village that is known as San Rafael.
Its inhabitants are country squires, conventional and quiet,
Who have moved from San Francisco to escape the noise and riot.
How can any San Rafaelite, then, recover from the shock
When he knows a fire or murder is occurring in his block,
When he knows the morning papers will in glaring headlines tell
How there's always something doing in the town of San Rafael?

Sharboro's Masterpiece

The leading representatives of the Italian colony are felicitating one another over having succeeded in banqueting Edmund des Planches, the Italian Embassador, to a finish. At the first banquet given in his honor he became ill shortly after the soup and was obliged to retire, much to the regret of the Latin spellbinders. The most disappointed of them was Andrea Sharboro, president of the Italian-American bank, and the Sam Shortridge of the Latin colony. Mr. Sharboro prides himself on his rounded periods and his florescent language, and he always has his speeches neatly typewritten for the press. He had what he was pleased to regard as a masterpiece prepared for that first banquet, and it was a great shock to him when the lion of the evening retired before the flow of oratory began. However he tried to prevail on the master of ceremonies to permit him to read a little of his flowery gem. But in vain. Fortunately the Embassador became convalescent, and a second banquet was pulled off. The speeches, warmed over for the occasion, were served just as though they were hot off the griddle and Des Planches remained to the end.

Sam Leake's Resignation

The news that Sam Leake had resigned the managing editorship of the Call to embark in private business did not come as a surprise . Rumors of the impending resignation were afloat for several days, and according to report differences had arisen between Mr. Leake and Mr. Spreckels over the wardenship of San Quentin. It was said that the Call's proprietor favored the appointment of Jackson Martin, that most expert of job-chasers who is always within easy reach of the city treasury. Mr. Leake put Detective Tom Gibson into the fight, and hence the split, say the gossips. But Mr. Spreckels says that the resignation of his managing editor was voluntary, and that Leake will not sever his connection with the paper until October.

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Morrison, H. A. Belasco, M. J. Brandenstein, W. S. and Miss Heger, Judge John Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Mendell Welcker, Hon. W. W. Foote and W. B. Sargent were recent arrivals at Byron Springs.

The Eccentric Whistler

James McNeil Whistler, the artist, whose recent death was chronicled in the despatches, was a man of singular fascination despite his egotism, his eccentricities and his capacity for making enemies. His strange traits of character puzzled many people, but his genius was never disputed. It was his absolute and unrelenting devotion to his art that made him the artist that he was, as well as eccentric. A friend of Whistler told me once that the artist never scrupled to insist upon a lady's coming all the way across London to stand for two minutes for a detail that needed fixing in the painting of the dress, for nature was his invariable master, and he insisted that she should be ever before him. On the other hand, though he delighted in an admiring crowd, yet no social engagement was ever strong enough to vie with the demands of the muse. Once when his friend was urging him to quit work and get off to a dinner party, where he was pledged, it did not move him to be told that the dinner was growing cold and that the guests were impatient for the lion. He uttered inarticulate grunts and painted on while his friend scolded. Finally he turned around and said:

"What a nuisance you are. The idea of leaving a beautiful thing like this to go eat with people."

His Eloquent Smash

Few men were so gifted as Whistler with an incisive descriptive faculty. Many stories have been told to illustrate this gift, but the one told me by my artist friend was probably never printed before. They were doing the rounds of a gallery together and Whistler was making his cynical comments on the works that he did not approve. They entered a room where hung some pictures by Bastien-Lepage, and, standing before a picture of this artist, Whistler, who found in himself his method and in nature his inspiration, made a deprecatory gesture and uttered the one word, "School." And, sure enough, there was the joint in the armor. Bastien-Lepage, a most devoted realist, could not banish the hall-mark of the academy.

His Vanity

No budget of stories about Whistler should omit those illustrative of his excessive vanity. How he replied that "Nature was creeping up" to his pictures, and his famous retort, "Why drag in Velasquez?" are well known, but allied with them is the less known, or, perhaps, unknown reply he made to a lady who met him at the Royal Academy, and expressed her surprise at seeing him in a place he was reported never to enter:

"Well," retorted Whistler, "one must do something to add interest to the show; so here I am."

His Generous Satire

Mathews and other San Francisco artists who studied in Paris and London are adding to the collection of anecdotes about Whistler, and not one but is worth the telling. One day the artist was visiting the studio of a fellow-painter and saw there one of his own works, sold long before. After eyeing it critically he seized a brush and palette and began to paint on it. His friend demurred and suggested that the owner of the picture might object.

"Good gracious!" returned Whistler, "you don't suppose a man owns a picture simply because he has bought it." At another time a Colorado millionaire called at Whistler's studio and after a hasty glance at the "color symphonies" on the walls, with the confidence of unlimited wealth, observed:

"How much for the lot?"

"Four millions," answered Whistler.

"What?"

"My posthumous price. Good morning."

Two artists who had been hostile to Whistler in their halcyon days found themselves reduced to drawing sidewalk pictures in the hope of catching stray pennies. Whistler, in telling a friend about it, remarked: "They were doing their sidewalk pictures—and doing them very well, too."

Ruskin Called Him "Coxcomb"

Whistler was not born in Lowell, Massachusetts, as the despatches stated, but in St. Petersburg, Russia, whither his father had gone to superintend some government engineering work. "Jimmy" was educated at West Point, as his father had been, but in the early fifties went to London. After studying art in Paris for some years he returned to London and made it his home. Public attention was first attracted to Whistler by his suit against John Ruskin, growing out of the latter's comments. Ruskin, as art critic for one of the London papers, carped at Whistler's eight paintings exhibited at the first Grosvenor Gallery exhibition in '77, and Whistler was given one farthing damages. In the pamphlet Whistler produced later he argued that "men of taste" and "amateurs" should not attend to art criticism, but that the critics should be professional painters. Ruskin called Whistler a "cockney" and a "coxcomb," and hinted at "puzzle pictures on advertising cards." Burne Jones, Frith and Albert Moore directed their criticisms at the eccentric's work, and it was in Paris that he met Du Maurier who caricatured him in "Trilby" and aroused his ire. His friends said of him, however, that he was one of the most charming, simple and witty of men. His hereditary white lock of hair was the rallying point of humor wherever he went.

When the Vendome Was Young

The presence of Mrs. W. T. Wallace among the Vendome's guests recalls memories of many years ago, when the hotel was new. At that time the Vendome was the favorite summer resort of Mrs. Wallace's daughter, Belle, then Mrs. Donahue, the young widow of Mervyn Donahue.

Gentlemen Whips to Chase Dollars

The sports at Del Monte this year are to be enlivened by daily coaching parties over the seventeen mile drive with "gentlemen whips" to handle the ribbons. Mr. Beylard showed what he could do in driving a coach for pay in the streets of San Francisco, and there are other Blingumites who will not disdain the nimble dollar to help pay the expenses of the week of sport. It is quite the correct thing in England, so why not here?

Miss Head's Broken Engagement

The story of Miss Anna Head's broken engagement, as it was retailed in San Francisco society years ago, is an interesting one and may or may not be true. Every one believed it at the time but, in the light of recent developments, I "hae me doots." However, this is what the innermost circles believed. It was said that Lieutenant Jephson, after the manner of so many impecunious Englishmen of good family, had demanded a money bonus with the girl and, failing to get it from the angry father, cabled to Miss Head that the engagement was broken. Society could have forgiven him for breaking the engagement, but not for cabling the news to her. They thought he might have broken it more gently and less expensively in a letter. After that the Heads became quite poor and were very much down on their luck for awhile, but recently some downtown property has increased largely in value and now they are on velvet again, though it isn't as large and soft a piece as that in which they used to sink their feet in the old days.

Crothers-Moore Engagement

The many friends of Miss Mabel Crothers are all greatly interested in her approaching marriage to Mr. Philip H. Moore of Hartford, Connecticut. Miss Crothers has been in the East and in Canada for several years, but while she was in California she made many warm and lasting friends. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Crothers of Niles, and the niece of Mr. R. A. Crothers and Mrs. Loring Pickering of San Francisco. Mr. Moore comes of an equally prominent family. He is the eldest son of the late H. Douglas Moore, and grandson of the Hon. Philip H. Moore of Moore's Station, Quebec, and also the grandson of the late Captain Arthur French who lost his life while on duty as chief officer of a steamer wrecked off the coast of Cape Mendocino, January fifth, 1860.

Major John A. Hull, who for two years served here as Judge Advocate on General Hughes's staff at Department headquarters, has recently been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. He has been stationed in Omaha since leaving San Francisco, and expects to go to the Philippines in the spring. With Mrs. Hull he will spend the coming winter in Washington. Major Ruhlen has for the last year been attached to the Quartermaster General's office in Washington, D. C. Colonel Daniel D. The Hotel Man Knew

The late Mrs. Blaine was not popular in Washington, owing to her autocratic air which she had acquired in her early school-teaching days, and was never able to shake off. I remember hearing a story about her told by a visitor to Washington. The latter was a stranger in Washington and happened to be staying at the same hotel where Secretary of State Blaine resided. She had never seen Mrs. Blaine. One day the visiting lady stepped into the elevator and said to the boy:

"Down!"

"Up!" said a second woman, following the first one into the lift.

The stranger's face grew red, but she stood her ground, and repeated, "Down!"

"Up!" said the other, a severe-looking elderly woman, who overtopped the stranger by some inches.

"Down!"

"Up!"

The elevator boy was badly rattled, but catching sight of the clerk he called to him. The clerk, looking from the tall woman's pale face to the flushed one of the other, blandly inquired the matter.

"I stepped into the elevator and ordered the boy to go down," explained the visiting lady, "and this woman followed and ordered him to go up."

The clerk knew his business. He turned to the boy and remarked severely:

"Take Mrs. Blaine up at once, and hereafter never hesitate in obeying her order."

Against her will the stranger made a trip to the upper floor, and, coldly triumphant, Mrs. Blaine made her point.

Mrs. Blaine was never an inspiration or help to her brilliant husband, but her sister, Gail Hamilton, was. She admired her great brother-in-law and her regard was reciprocated. Gail Hamilton had a brain above the average and was often credited with being the author of the Plumed Knight's speeches. However it is more likely that her sympathetic mind helped to bring out Blaine's brightness, rather than being its source.

Mrs. Hattie Blaine Beale is said to possess a disposition very similar to that of her mother. She never shows her feelings. Mrs. Blaine was disappointed in the matches made by two of her children, and it was she, it was said at the time, whose bitter opposition to her son James's marriage with Marie Nevins caused its final severance.

Mrs. Ella Sterling Mighels will shortly leave for New York to join her husband, Philip Verrill Mighels. They expect to return here in about two years and build a home in the Piedmont hills.

The Reticent Greene

General Greene, who dropped into town the other day, and who refused to be interviewed about the asphalt trust, in which that wonderful financier, Will Crocker, was involved, presides over a "reform" administration of the Police Department of New York. At the time of his appointment several papers expressed great surprise, for at that time his business methods were not unknown. A demand is now being made for his suspension pending an investigation of the grave charges preferred against him by the receiver of the Asphalt Trust. A suit to recover unlawful profits reaped in the promotion of a trust implies the commission of a fraud, and if Greene is guilty of having bought properties at one price and having turned them over to the trust at a higher valuation after pocketing his share of the benefits, he is manifestly unfit to serve as a police commissioner.

"I don't think she has much of a reputation to speak of."
"Well, no, not above a whisper."

Edith McBean was always a fine-looking girl, but since her marriage with Dr. Kierstedt she has grown positively handsome. She looks particularly well in a pale biscuit shade tailor suit, which harmonizes artistically with her blonde tints.

The Introduction of Lady Nicotine

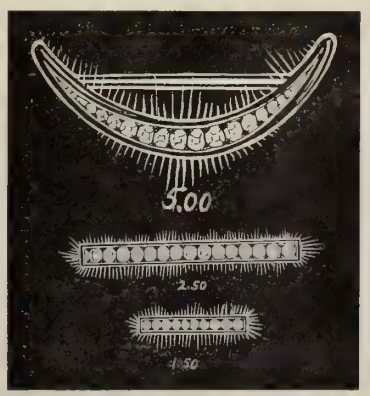
Quite recently the debate arose among some mentors of the local smart set as to how and when the universally spreading custom of smoking was introduced into American society. Some blamed Germany, others Russia, and still others England, but it was pretty generally agreed that Washington was the port-hole through which the pretty vice first entered our Puritanical midst. Washington has, perhaps, the most cosmopolitan as well as the fastest society life in the country, and it was among the ambassadorial maids and matrons that the Yankee girl first saw the Turkish cigarette touched to feminine lips. Smoking "caught on" among Washington society women long before it spread abroad, even as far as New York, and it was hinted that before the new fad was regulated the fashionable physicians of Washington had on their hands over a score of mysterious cases which proved to be nothing more or less than tobacco heart. It is worthy of remark, by the way, that the American girl is just becoming experienced enough in the use of the weed to hold her cigarette properly—that is, in the left hand and between the first and second fingers. This is "man fashion," for to hold the cigarette in the right hand would sadly interfere with important work.

The Defamers of Bryan

Editor TOWN TALK:

When not engaged in singing the praises of Grover Cleveland, these same President-making newspapers to whom I referred in my last letter devote some of their purchased space to the equally congenial task of abusing William J. Bryan. The anti-Bryan band of braying asses is led by that magnificent burro of the East, Whitelaw Reid, son-in-law of our great philanthropist, D. O. Mills, whose cold-blooded treatment of W. C. Ralston drove the latter to suicide. Mr. Reid was one of President McKinley's commissioners to conclude the Spanish war, and largely upon his advice our Government was induced to pay Spain twenty million dollars of good American money for a so-called title to the Philippines, which the Spanish Government never possessed. In order that this dilettante statesman might have an opportunity of showing our English cousins how nearly we could copy their "flunkeyism," Mr. Reid was appointed special commissioner to represent this Government at the Coronation of Edward VII. And in order that the Mills millions might not be depleted, Congress was asked to appropriate fifty thousand dollars of the people's money to enable Mr. Reid to appear properly arrayed at a foreign court, which was then engaged in suppressing the efforts of the Dutch colonists of South Africa to maintain their free Republic. And this is the man who has ever since been engaged in bitter denunciation of William Jennings Bryan, whose shoestrings he is not worthy to unlatch.

Now a word or two about William Jennings Bryan, who is not a candidate but whose influence will be powerful in any large gathering of honest Jeffersonian Democrats. He has always taken an active interest in politics, and has always advocated true Democratic principles. Young, ardent, honest and eloquent, the Democrats of Kansas, where he engaged in the practice of law, soon availed themselves of his services on the stump, and he was nominated for Congress in a Republican district. He was placed upon the Committee of Ways and Means, a very signal honor for a young member serving his first term. Bryan's speeches in Congress upon the tariff question were not surpassed in logic, sound sense and eloquence by those of any other members, on either side of the House. So highly were they thought of by the National Democratic Committee that they were printed by its order in the political hand-book circulated by the committee for the guidance of the Democratic campaign orators of the various States. Mr. Bryan's epeech on Decoration Day at Arlington Cemetery was a masterpiece of patriotism and eloquence. In the Democratic National Convention of 1896 Bryan appeared as a member of a contested delegation from Nubraska, and after a stormy and protracted debate before the committee on credentials, the delegation of which he was a member was admitted, and Bryan became a mmber of the committee on platform and resolutions. When the report of that committee came before the convention as a whole it had been arranged that Senator Jones of Arkansas should close the debate for the majority report, but he magnanimously requested that Bryan should have that privilege, and the result was that Bryan's eloquent speech gave him the nomination for the Presidency. The nomination was received by the people at large with the wildest enthusiasm, and was opposed only by the Wall street Democrats. These deserters put Palmer and Buckner in the race for the purpose of compassing the defeat of Bryan, but most of them voted for McKinley. Notwithstanding the efforts of these deserters, Bryan received more popular votes than any other man who had ever before ran for President, excepting, of course, the number cast for his successful opponent. Having accomplished their wicked purpose, these Palmer and Buckner Democrats came out from under cover and not only boasted of their treachery but began to assume the role of the only true Democracy. The treachery and desertion of Cleveland and his friends defeated Bryan, not by patriotic assassination like that of Brutus and Cæsar, but by the low and cunning methods pursued by the Italian Vendetta. And now these traitors and deserters boldly proclaim themselves as the only true Democrats, and demand the right to control the organization, nominate its candidates and formulate its principles.



Gentlemen of the subsidized press, your unholy efforts to destroy the great Democratic party of Jefferson and Jackson will prove abortive. More than six million Democrats who follow the standard of Bryan refuse to be led by or dictated to by a coterie of traiters and deserters, who polled less than one per cent of the vote at the election of 1896. Benedict Arnold, demanding the command of the American armies after his desertion at West Point, is the only fitting parallel of Cleveland and his little bunch of deserters, demanding that they be permitted to lead the Democrats in the next campaign.

A Woman's Constancy

A barren road lies parching in the sun;
Its drear monotony and tiresome length
Drags on, and threatens never to have done.

I toil along the rough, uneven way
With heart depressed, with face tear-stained and worn,
And dread the light of each succeeding day.

One morn, when all but sunk beneath my load,
My untaught lips essayed a prayer, and lo,
The light of Calvary shone o'er the road.

No hope but one, the cross. A dream I nursed—
But that is dead. O God, desert me now,
Then chaos is, and I'm indeed accursed.

My dream, a weakling's dream, no more will fret
My yearning heart. Within the mighty calm
Of yonder sacred cross, I will forget.

Come, subtle essence of a power divine,
Cloak all my senses in thy mystery,
And shield me from all mastery but thine.

* * * * * * * *

Mankind is weak, O God, the steady light
Of Thy Great Presence awes; so keep me firm
Lest I drift back to sin, and to the night.

My erring heart still grieves; it moans its loss
In silent anguish. Is there no relief
For those who kneel and cry beneath the cross?

Just God, forgive! In vain I've tried to slay
This love within my breast. Take Thou all else
But give me back my dream of yesterday.

* * * * * * * *

Two faces silhouetted in the dawn;
The woman sits and dreams in sweet content;
Her prayer is answered—but the cross is gone.

July, 1903. MABEL PORTER PITTS.

The Irony of It

"Shake up my pillows, please, dear."

It was as natural to Ronald to use the caressing epithet as for some men to omit the "please."

He never gave a thought to what the little "dear" might mean to the young girl in the neat gingham frock and apron who had been in attendance upon him since he first entered the hospital. His brown eyes always lighted up when she came near him. He liked her to smooth the sheets and do all the little offices that make a sick room seem less like a prison. Sometimes he caught her smooth, soft, yet firm hands in his, and pressed them gently. She was so kind, so tender of him.

It was her duty to do what she could to make his aching bones forget their pains. But somehow, when Ronald spoke to her Anne forgot she was only a trained nurse. He had such a loving way with him. Women had petted him since he was an infant. They all loved him. How could Anne escape his charm?

As for Ronald, to him she was only his nurse. Yet he could no more help making love to her than he could change the fact that he loved but one—and that one Marion.

Marion did not know he was ill. He would not let them send her word, for that would spoil her pleasure. She, beautiful, happy creature, was enjoying her first season in society. She wrote to Ronald, and he on his bed of pain listened to Anne as she read the gay accounts of teas, balls and dinners in which "I" figured largely, with hints of the conquests "I" was making by the score. Ronald was supposed by his fiancee to be surveying railroads in Arizona and looking, perhaps, for a stray mine that might bring the wedding day nearer the present.

To Anne it all seemed terribly selfish. She looked at Ronald, pale on his pillows, and wondered how any woman could go on and amuse herself far from him. "Why doesn't she know, and come?" she asked herself.

Then she hugged closer her joy in her task. She let her heart luxuriate in the crumbs that fell her way, tender words unconsciously dropped. delicious moments when Ronald's hand touched hers, or his brown eyes smiled into her gray ones. She wore herself into a shadow over her charge, denying herself sleep that he might miss no moment of her care.

And one day into the sick-room floated a radiant vision. It was not necessary to tell Anne who it was.

"Marion!" a weak voice called from the pillows. The brown head was raised and two thin arms were outstretched.

"Ronald, why didn't I know before?"

The great bunch of roses she carried fell upon the floor as the radiant vision leaned over the brown head.

Anne turned her face away. The end had come, she knew, for her.

"You'll get well, darling, now that I have come," cooed Marion.

"That I will, sweetheart," returned Ronald, his own face reflecting her radiance.

"It's all very well to say doctors can cure one," went on Marion, "but they can't, you know. A little love—a great big lot of love—is what does the business."

Ronald remembered something then.

"Marion, I want you to meet my little nurse," he said, "she's the best little nurse in all the world."

But when Marion turned to the window, there was no figure in a neat gingham frock and white apron there. Anne had gone.

Automobile Topics

Fancy a Vanderbilt serving as an exemplar of caution and discretion for automobilists! The Vanderbilts have done so much reckless scorching and figured in so many accidents in consequence that it was popularly supposed that they had done much to arouse popular prejudice against the horseless carriage. But the other day Alfred G. Vanderbilt caused the arrest of one P. Ford in Middletown, R. I., for scorching. It was not, however, that he objected to the practice, but he had grown tired of having a bad reputation. It appears that the people of Newport and the surrounding country, whenever they saw a saucy red wagon rushing along the highway, would say: "There goes that young Vanderbilt." Of course this must have been very irritating to the law-abiding youth. Did he ever try to find out what his automobile was capable of? Did he ever run over dogs, chickens or even children? That was an exhilarating diversion he had never sampled. So he made up his mind to make a reputation. Though the local regulations allow a maximum speed of ten miles an hour in the towns of the island, he will confine himself to five. And besides he will not go out at night. Did anybody ever hear of such renunciation? It is almost heroic. If this had happened before the Bailey bill was introduced at Albany, perhaps that measure would never have reached the Governor. I commend the example of Mr. Vanderbilt to all automobilists. There are a few in San Francisco who would render a great service to all lovers of the auto if they could content themselves with less speed than they sometimes indulge even on city thoroughfares. If our automobilists become amateur policemen and help to capture and convict the law-breakers, the speed problem will become a mere trifle.

Miss Ethyl Hager's ardor was not dampened by the injury to her arm received a few weeks ago while repairing her auto. She is one of the greatest enthusiasts on the coast.

It was an Irishman who, when asked the other day if his interest in his auto had increased, replied that it reached the "automobilin'" point.

Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Campbell of Detroit, Mich., are on their honeymoon, touring this State in an automobile.

George A. Knight has forsworn allegiance temporarily to his gasoline launch. He has always been an ardent sailor and also a lover of horseflesh, but since his return from Paris he has been very much interested in his automobile.

Notwithstanding the excellent manner in which the recent International Automobile Cup race was conducted, popular sentiment in England, as revealed by the British press, is opposed to automobile racing hereafter on the public roads. It is argued that the auto that has a speed of ninety miles an hour is only a costly toy. The racing auto is a dangerous nuisance and is only impeding the development of touring and freight cars which may become useful servants of commerce and locomotion in the future. All that can be learned by races has been learned, and learned in some instances at frightful cost. —The Chauffeur.

Happy Is the Man Who Shoots a Deer

There is nothing that affords so much pleasure to the busy denizen of the city as the killing of a deer. How joyfully and buoyantly he will carry to his camp or summer boarding-house a load that in the city he would consider fit only for a horse. With what pride he will show it to his friends and dilate on the details of his successful hunt. And if ladies be present, he soon begins to feel himself a hero.

For how many months does this "tale of his shoot" interest himself, if not his friends. His recital may vary, but no matter how many deer he may tell of having seen after shooting this one, and how easily he could have brought them down (but not how many he may have shot at) he will invariably wind up by stating that he a "gentleman sport" and would not kill more than the one, that being sufficient for the time for himself and friends.

To kill a deer is an ambition we all possess. We are never too old or too young for this sport. If we could only jump up and "get there" quick! In this respect the residents of the bay counties have the advantage over the residents of any other part of the United States. Mendocino and Sonoma counties are practically a deer park and only a few hours' ride from San Francisco. Leaving San Francisco in the morning, the hunter reaches Willits, in the heart of Mendocino county, in time for dinner, and Geyserville, Cloverdale, Hopland, Ukiah and other intermediate rail points considerably earlier. If you do not plug a deer that evening you are in good shape for an early morning start. The deer throughout this section, along the California Northwestern Railway, are more plentiful this season than for years. The game has been well protected. So many of the farmers take boarders that they have learned the value of deer as an attraction, and have joined hands with the law in protecting them.

The open season for deer in Sonoma county is from July 15 to August 31, inclusive, and in Mendocino county until September 30, inclusive.

Advice to Young Grandfathers

There is a period in the life of every healthy and well-raised grandfather when, feeling the pulse of youth throbbing in his veins, he is apt, if not admonished by one of wiser years, to fall into one of the thousand temptations and pitfalls which surround him and prey upon his exuberance and unrestrained enthusiasm. It is with a view to saving him from these that we have framed a few suggestions which, in his encounter with the world and its wiles, may stand him in good stead:

If the young lady repeats her fondness for you, don't hesitate about paying for the supper and extras before her admiration grows cold. Your charms may not be so great as they used to be, but your money's just as good.

If you are thinking of marrying, untie your pursestrings first and your heartstrings afterward.

Even in the flush of gallantry do not write any letters or sign any strange documents—they may be used in the future as contract marriages.

Do your spending away from relatives and heirs, who have an unpleasant habit of confusing generosity with insanity even in the most youthful grandfathers.

If you are impecunious or frugal you had better adopt a domestic pose, for the vulgar appreciate levity in the old only when accompanied by reckless spending.

An old rollicker is usually as young as he feels and often, we regret to say, as foolish as he looks.

Never get jealous of young men. It's beneath your dignity—besides, it won't do any good.

You'd best not take an orchestra chair at the show. People will class you with the elderly gentlemen who sit on either side of you, even though you wear a toupee.

If any one accuses you of being a masher tell them that it is merely your old school gallantry.

If you get a pretty young wife do everything in your power to keep her, for you must remember that a fool and his "honey" are soon parted.

Boast of your dissipations, your conquests and your battles, if you wish. You will be believed by nobody but yourself, but nobody will dare dispute you so long as you pay your bills.

Do not make a will. It is as good as a signed acknowledgment that you are not so young as your grandchildren.

Old people usually gain frivolity at the expense of dignity—which is not important so long as they are enjoying themselves.

Even though you are frequently disappointed in love, do not be discouraged. There are plenty of charming young women just pining to be old men's darlings, and subsequently to pass into a dashing widowhood.

Follow these few humble suggestions, aspiring grandfathers, and you will be surprised to find yourselves becoming younger every day—so rapidly, in fact, that some morning you may awake to discover yourselves babbling in a second childhood.

STAGE

D'Arville at the Tivoli

It's like old times at the Tivoli these days, or rather nights, for the stock company at the venerable opera house is once more in tune and the heavenly maid is again lusty and on the key. The Tivoli needed just such a woman as Camille D'Arville to infuse the real comic opera spirit into the company. It had an abundance of talent before but there was something lacking. In the veteran comic opera prima donna it has a woman who has all the dash and verve essential to the frothy style of entertainment for which the house is famous. It is pleasant to see Camille D'Arville in tights again. She has grown somewhat stouter since her Maid Marian days, but plumpness has only accentuated her beautiful curves. Her limbs, no longer lithe, taper as of yore, and the magnetism of her personality is as pronounced as ever. And by the way there are few more magnetic women on the stage. So subtle and potent is her magnetism that it compels admiration for her vocal art, though that is the least of her charms. Her voice is rich of quality but not remarkable for the control exhibited or for its possibilities. Its mellow tones, however, always evoke great enthusiasm. It was a large house and an exuberant one that greeted the singer on her first night at the Tivoli. It had been announced that Mrs. Crellin had wearied of social life and had decided to become Camille D'Arville again, and she was welcomed just as though she really had been in retirement. The fact is that the dashing singer was never divorced from her art. She married and indulged in the conventional treacle-moon diversion but that was all. She has been earning a salary on the stage intermittently ever since. Marriage never cured her of the stage habit. "The Highwayman" in which she is now appearing is one of Smith and De Koven's operas, and it has all the familiar characteristics of their work. It abounds in pretty music, though there are not many catchy tunes, and it has several good parts. One of them is the role of Dick Fitzgerald, played by Arthur Cunningham, who does a very clever bit of work. Indeed it is the best performance he ever gave at the Tivoli. Edwin Stevens is quaint and comical as Foxy Quiller, the hawkshaw. Ferris Hartman has a subordinate part which he handles conscientiously. He deserves special credit for the staging of the production. The piece brings out the full strength of the company and the ensemble work is very effective. The central figures at all times are Stevens and Camille D'Arville, and the latter presents a most picturesque appearance in the disguise of a dashing gallant. It is refreshing occasionally to see on the Tivoli stage a costume that doesn't bear the trade-mark of Goldstein & Cohen whose tawdry fineries are sufficiently antique to deck the cases of a museum.

Crawford Drama in Stock

When Viola Allen produced "In the Palace of the King" at the Columbia, I was disappointed in the play. It was not a drama in which to exploit a star, for it affords no special opportunities in any single role. It is far more suitable for a stock company. The large cast necessary gives every member of a stock organization a chance, and no role aside from those of the few principals outshines another. The Neill-Morosco company that opened at the California Monday night was not over-praised by its advance agent. Lillian Kemble, who has Viola Allen's role of Dolores, is a beautiful woman, and Elsie Esmond as Inez invests the part with much pathetic interest. Adora Andrews plays the scheming Princess with skill, bringing out all the fine shades in the character. Of the men Frank MacVicars as the Cardinal is a superb and heroic figure and he impersonates the fascinating churchman with grace and vigor. The other parts are all acceptably filled with the exception of the court fool, "Adonis," which loses all its strength in the hands of Joseph Dailey and becomes a whining, mouthing puppet.

A San Francisco girl has joined the Neill-Morosco company, and plays a small part in this week's play. Her stage name is Elizabeth Hartstone; she recently made her debut at Fischer's at a matinee given by Paul Gerson's pupils, and she will probably overcome the handicap which a person with histrionic aspiration assumes by entering a dramatic school.

At the Grand

The third of the Rogers Brothers' musical eccentricities is even livelier than its predecessors. Herbert Sears in a feminine stunt is capital. "The Belle of Murray Hill," sung by Louise Moore and chorus, made an instant hit Sunday night. The Arizona newspaperwoman played by Anna Wilks is very amusing and her song, "Mollie Shannon," pleased the gallery at once. Arnold Grazer's toe dancing won a round of applause for its grace and beauty. The Esmeralda sisters also have a pretty dance. The new Amazon march is as good as anything ever seen here in that line, even in the old spectacular leg-show days.

The New Mephisto and the Old

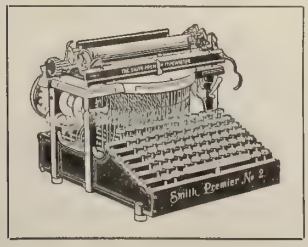
For years we had come too look upon "Faust" as the exclusive possession of Lewis Morrison. Theodore Roberts and others have played Mephistopheles, but somehow Lewis Morrison seemed the only one to whom the role really belonged. However, Mr.

Morrison has retired from active stage life, and he is willing to let Mephisto's laurels be worn by a younger man. The aged actor was of the audience at the Central on Monday night, and no applause was warmer than his when Herschel Mayall scored a point in his old part. When Mayall was called upon for a speech he paid a pretty compliment to Mr. Morrison who had coached him in his part. Mayall at once played his way into the favor of the audience, and promises to be the most popular leading man the Central has yet had. Not far behind his hit as Mephisto was Edwin Emery's successful Faust. Eugenie Thais Lawton was a most effective Marguerite and George P. Webster a strong Valentine. The scenic features, especially the great Brocken scene, received a round of applause attesting the scenic artist's talent.

Shakespeare Out of Doors

Nance O'Neil will be tendered a monster testimonial at Sutro Heights, Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings, August first and second, when four open-air performances of Shakespeare's delightful comedy, "As You Like It," will be given. For the first time in her histrionic career the young star will don male attire. "Rosalind" should suit her to a nicety. She will be accorded excellent support, E. J. Ratcliffe being the Orlando, Charles A. Millward the Jacques and Herbert Carr, Oliver. A better selection for the part of Touchstone would be hard to find than L. R. Stockwell, and Blanche Stoddard should make a delightful Celia. James J. Corbett, the actor-pugilist, has been selected for Charles the Wrestler, a part that he has played with great success on several occasions with notable casts in the East. The charming incidental music will be sung by the Knickerbocker double quartet and over sixty people will take part in the production. An army of carpenters will transform the prettiest portion of Sutro Heights into an open-air auditorium, and boxes and seats that will comfortably accommodate four thousand people will be constructed. The sale of seats will begin at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s music house Monday morning, July twenty-seventh, at nine o'clock, and, from all indications, there will be an immense demand for choice locations.

The Bingham Season



Perhaps Mrs. Bingham knows her business thoroughly and perhaps Mr. Bingham is a very wise manager, but after seeing "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson" I am of the opinion that they blundered egregiously in starting their repertoire in this city with a Clyde Fitch play and winding up with one from the French that Mr. Fitch had only tampered with. "The Climbers" is a fairly good play. It is above the average of the Fitch output but it is a dramatic potboiler in comparison with "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson." This adaptation from the French is decidedly Frenchy and in spots a trifle coarse, but it has substance and motif and it affords an occasional thrill, not to speak of numerous laughs. The complications have the true Gallic flavor and they are unfolded with considerable deftness, though not with that delicacy which is suitable to the Anglo-Saxon taste. It is staged more sumptuously than were the previous Bingham productions and Miss Bingham gives a very good performance in the role of Mrs. Johnson. In Jim Morley Lackaye has a role suited to his temperament, though it is not of the style of parts in which he has most distinguished himself. Miss Bingham has not had such a successful season here as she had hoped for but she is not dissatisfied. She opened in an inauspicious season and under the circumstances has drawn fairly well. On Monday night she was given a very warm reception and took occasion to pay San Francisco the familiar graceful compliments. Lackaye also spoke and was more frank than the star. He suggested that the people who liked the play should write to their friends at the summer resorts to come home and occupy the empty seats. Next week the company will play repertoire.

The Wednesday matinee next week at the Columbia will be devoted to "The Climbers"; the Saturday matinee to "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson." Ezra Kendall will open his second tour in "The Vinegar Buyer" at the Columbia week after next. Kendall's tour is under the management of Liebler & Co.

Morality plays have enjoyed vogue in London and the Eastern cities for some time past, and now we are to see one. "Every man," the fifteenth century morality play will be produced at Will Greenbaum's new Lyric hall early in September. The first presentation in California will be at the Berkeley university upon the invitation of President Wheeler. The play was given in four different seasons in London, and played seasons in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago, receiving the approval of the Archbishop of Canterbury, S. Watts R. A., Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia ,Sarah Bernhardt, President Eliot and Edward Everett Hale.

The Miller-Anglin Season

The Miller-Anglin season will open at the Columbia on August seventeenth. The opening play has not yet been decided upon, but during the engagement will be presented George Bernard Shaw's brilliant comedy "The Devil's Disciple," Richard Harding Davis's "The Taming of Helen," a new play from the French, "The Lady of Lyons" and "Camille." In the company will be Martha Waldron, Kate Patterson Selten, Mary Wright, Herbert Titheredge, Morton Selten, R. Lewis and Frank Hitchcock. These names are not such a bright array as those of last season, but they may stand for very efficient actors nevertheless. With Henry Miller at the helm, the productions are sure to be faultless in stage management. Margaret Anglin is said to have several trunks full of chic Parisian frocks. Louis Nethersole, the press agent of the company, is getting in some exceedingly clever work in advance of his attraction. It is a pity Mr. Nethersole's charming wife, Sadie Martinot, could not have been added to the company.

At the Orpheum

Ethel Leavy's dancing is a feature of the Orpheum program this week. The clever Californienne has an entertaining stunt and wins a lot of applause for her turn. "The Wrong Man" is a bright sketch and Claude Gillingwater and his company bring a lot out of it. The Orpheum Comedy Four are great favorites.

Miss Eleanor Haber, of David Belasco's company, who is out here from New York on her vacation, will give a monologue recital before she returns in September.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The Columbia will revive "The Climbers" for the last week of Amelia Bingham's engagement, and will alternate it with "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson."

"The Manxman," the dramatization of Hall Caine's first success and generally conceded his best novel, will be the Alcazar's bill. It is the first time the play has ever been given in this city.

The second week of the Neill-Morosco company at the California will be produced for the first time here Genevieve Haine's society drama, "Hearts Aflame." The story revolves around the theme of a society man who becomes ruined through unfortunate speculation and accepts financial assistance from a wealthy and politely dissipated bachelor who is in love with his wife. All the company will be well cast. The following Sunday night will be presented "Janice Meredith." On and after that date the opening plays and attractions at the California will take place on Sunday night instead of Monday.

"In Wall Street" is drawing immense houses to the Grand and the piece will go all next week.

Eleanor Jenkins, one of Anna Held's beauties, has joined Fischer's company and will be in the next production. Following "Under the Red Globe" will come "The Big Little Princess" and "Quo Vass Iss."

"The Highwayman" will easily crowd the Tivoli for some time to come.

"A Lion's Heart" will be a strong attraction in which to exploit Herschel Mayall and the Central's strong stock. The play has a plot in which figure a bride and groom, a robbery, a murdered detective and various other excitements. The comedy element is strong, especially in the bridal tour when the "honeymoon smile" becomes a byword.

Mme. Konorah, known as "the modern witch and mistress of mysteries," will make her first appearance in this city at the Orpheum. She solves instantly the most intricate arithmetical problems, without seeing or hearing the figures. She adds a row of numerals that totals trillions with the ease of a schoolboy multiplying two by two. James J. Morton, the fun-maker, is an old favorite. Macart's dogs and monkeys will renew acquaintance. Claudius and Corbin, renowned banjoists, late of Primrose and Dockstader's minstrels, will be new here. Ethel Levey will sing the latest song success of her husband, George M. Cohan, "If I Were Only Mr. Morgan."

At the Chutes will be the three Kunns, novelty musicians, one of whom plays a "'cello-guitar," Maude Still, a dainty soubrette; Zano, "the great," will present feats of modern magic; and Mexias and Mexias, "the clown and his dog," A Mirror Maze will shortly be added to the attractions.

Applause Was Ironic

Too much advance press notice frequently defeats its object. Particularly is this the case when a new aspirant for histrionic honors is brought forward. In the case of Edwards Davis, the ex-parson-turned-actor was the cause of his own undoing. The play, "The Unmasking," in which Mr. Davis made his Oakland debut, was his own work. Whatever else it unmasked in the plot it certainly succeeded in laying bare a paucity of playwright talent. "The worst ever" was the audience's chorus as it filed out of the Macdonough on Monday night. The actor-author did not lack for applause as the play dragged on its way, but he very wisely refused to respond to the calls for a speech. The play was heavy melodrama, but its situations provoked the risibles rather than the tear-ducts.

Tears En Regle

The business manager of a high class Eastern attraction, in a conversation with a well known railroad man the other day very significantly remarked: "It has become a serious proposition to bring expensive companies to this coast to play at two dollars when the Alcazar is giving such remarkable productions for less than half the money. I don't see how Belasco can afford to keep up the pace he has set." But judging from the crowded houses, the Alcazar management has no cause for complaint. It certainly spends money without stint, but the presumption is that the weekly balance sheet is satisfactory. The acquisition of "The Manxman," a play by Hall Caine which has provoked as much discussion as his "Eternal City" or "The Christian," is an enterprising stroke, for not only has it never been given by a stock company but it has never been seen in San Francisco. As Marc Antony remarked at the funeral services of his particular friend Cæsar, "You who have tears to shed, prepare to shed them now." The story of the self-sacrificing Manxman is emotional to a degree, and the matinee girls who go to see White Whittlesey in the role made famous by Wilson Barrett and James O'Neill will find it advisable to tuck a spare pocket handkerchief into the little handbag.

Price Astonishes New York

During his recent visit to New York Mr. E. D. Price was interviewed by the morning Telegraph, and that paper devoted half a page to a discussion of the Belasco-Mayer enterprises, which were said to be to the Pacific coast what those of Charles Frohman are to the Atlantic. Price astonished the interviewer by telling him that the Alcazar stock has a record of three hundred and sixty-seven consecutive weeks. We have never thought anything of this achievement but it is unprecedented in the history of theatricals in this country. Price also stated that for its size San Francisco is the greatest theatrical town in the country.

Tyndall's Popular Sunday Night Lectures

Dr. McIvor-Tyndall believes that we are on the verge of discovering the great secrets of life, the origin of life and the cause of decay and death. This will be done through the efforts of psychic science. "Faith in immortality," he said at his lecture last Sunday night, "is no longer possible without actual proof of the truth of the belief. This will undoubtedly be so thoroughly demonstrated within the present century that the world will wonder how we could have so long remained in ignorance of it. There is a natural law governing all psychic manifestations. The fact that we have not found, and reduced it to the same working order as electricity, proves nothing against it, as the discovery of electricity is a recent one, although the force has always existed." Tomorrow night Tyndall will lecture on "The Thought that Kills," showing that there are actual chemical changes produced in the human organism by a certain train of thought. The lecture will be followed by telepathic experiments. On August second the lecture will be on "Is Telepathy a Lost Faculty or a Development?"

George Trader, who has been promoted to starship lately and will appear next season in "A Fool and His Money," is a San Francisco boy. He used to be a prime favorite in the Alcazar company, when he was a young thing new to the stage. He appeared at the Alcazar when L. R. Stockwell was the manager, in the company which made a specialty of the Daly comedies, "The Magistrate," et al. Trader is a good-looking youth with a smile and dimples that are most fascinating to feminine auditors.

Gladys Unger, daughter of Frank Unger, who attracted some attention in London's literary circles by a dramatic version of Brinsley Sheridan's life, has written a play, the American rights of which have been secured by Frohman. —The Playgoer.

Return of the Marquardts

The Marquardts are back in town. John Marquardt and his wife Alexandra, the distinguished harpist, left this city for a tour of the world in June, 1901. They started by way of the Orient, and they gave concerts in all the principal cities of China, Japan and India. They toured New Zealand and Australia and in June, 1902, they reached Germany and while there were engaged for the Philadelphia Orchestra for the season of 1902-3. This is the famous symphony orchestra of which our old friend Fritz Scheel is leader. Marquardt was engaged as concert master and his wife as harpist. According to Marquardt, this orchestra achieved a great artistic triumph, but it lost seventy thousand dollars in the season. It is sustained by wealthy people who defray all the expenses, and it is evident from the extent of its loss that Philadelphia upholds its reputation for musical culture at considerable cost to the little coterie of plutocrats who appreciate the genius of Fritz Scheel. The Marquardts are great favorites in local musical and Bohemian circles, and they have contributed a great deal toward the musical culture of this city. That they added to their laurels abroad is evident from the newspaper criticisms in the cities visited by them. In India Mr. Marquardt was pronounced the finest violinist that had been heard there since the visit of Remenyi. Acording to the Bombay Gazette, "The Marquardts are artists of the very first rank." I hear that Mr. Marquardt contemplates reorganizing his orchestra and that he will resume his teaching.

Marquardt Talks of His Trip

Speaking about the native music in Japan, Mr. Marquardt says that they have a very odd collection of melodies, dating from the age of the Shoguns. This music, of which he heard a good many representative performances, is most unsatisfactory to a Western musician, as it lacks the principle of our tonic system, their scale being similar to the old Grecian Doric. The combination of instruments is very interesting and the effect most weird, and antiquity sounds from every tune. Tokyo has a Royal College of Music, where can be heard the finest chorus singing. Piano and violin playing is taught by European teachers. "At a select concert in Tokyo," said Mr. Marquardt, "we were assisted by a Japanese singer, who very creditably sang Wagner's Song to the Evening Star. Talking about Eastern royalty, we must say something about Siam, the land of the sacred white elephant. The King of Siam is a very jovial gentleman who speaks English fluently, likes music, and at a royal concert in the Siamese theatre the princes and princesses, of which there are many, showed great curiosity, especially when the harp came forward. The Sultan of Delhi (Sumatra), who true to his title has fifty wives, heard us in a private recital, when his adored were listening behind screens. This gentleman is quite a musician, plays violin, and his ladies get instruction in piano playing from a German professor." Speaking of his experience in India Mr. Marquardt said that their concerts in that country were largely attended by English people. The Viceroy attended one concert in Calcutta. One of their most profitable ventures was a concert to the Boer prisoners, who blessed them for their treat. In Manila, by the way, they were entertained by Mrs. Taft in her beautiful castle, Malacanem.

Professor E. S. Bonelli and Mrs. Bonelli have been summering at Los Gatos. They were in a runaway accident on Wednesday last week, but fortunately escaped without injury. They were out driving, with a lady friend as guest, and their horse shied and bolted. But the only damage done was to the nerves of the carriage's occupants. Mrs. Bonelli handled the reins and proved herself a heroine.

Musical people are coming back to town and by the first of August there will probably be some concerts on the tapis.

Another Addition to Our Music Cult

Walter Handel Thorley, who recently came here from England, is a very notable addition to the noted musicians who have settled in San Francisco. He is a pianist of rare talent, having studied under his distinguished cousin, James Thorley, Reinecke, Wenzel, Jadassohn and Richter. His father was a contrabassist in the famous Sir Charles Halle orchestra in Manchester, and all his life Mr. Thorley has known what it was to have music around him. He has composed some fine classic works, a "Macbeth" symphonic poem having received high praise from London critics. He was a profesor in the Royal Academy, London, for some time. Mr. Thorley played at Stanford University shortly after his arrival here and his gifts were very generally acknowledged.

The latest English comic opera is "My Lady Molly," which is now playing in London. It is not a musical comedy or a musical farce, but a straight comic opera. The music is by Sidney Jones, the composer of "The Geisha," "San Toy," and "The Medal and the Maid." I hear that it is to be produced in this country during the coming season.

Madame Jennie Norelli, the Swedish corature soprano engaged to appear with Henry W. Savage's English grand opera company next season, is expected to arrive from abroad shortly. During the past season Madame Norelli has been singing at the Philharmonic concerts in London.

Marcus Mayer, who will manage Patti's farewell tour, recently returned from England where he heard the diva sing. He reports that her voice was never more exquisite, and that she did not seem a day over thirty-five. She will arrive in this country October twenty-eighth.

Miss Amy Gregory of Centerville, who is to marry Oliver Blanchard of San Jose next month, is an amateur whistler of natural talent. She also sings, having studied for some time under Mrs. Hillman-Smith of San Jose. Mr. Blanchard is also a singer, and studied under Mrs. Marriner-Campbell.

It is proposed to establish a permanent symphony orchestra in this city. Such a proposition has often been made, and at times has seemed on the verge of realization. It would be a very good thing for the city were it to be accomplished.

Jessie Bartlett Davis has been engaged to fill an important position in the company that is to aid Francis Wilson in imparting new life to "Erminie" and "The Little Corporal" next September.

Sir Henry Heyman has been spending a part of the season at the Arlington in Santa Barbara. He will be back in town by August third. —The Music Critic.

LETTERS

"The Lions of the Lord"

Those whose recollections of reading carry them back to the middle years of the nineteenth century will be apt to find little fiction in "The Lions of the Lord." The book concerns itself with the early days of Mormonism, and covers a period dating from soon after the "martyrdom" of Joseph Smith to about 1870, and so well has the author grasped the Mormon point of view that for the first half of the story he might be supposed to be holding a brief for Brigham Young and his followers. Had Mr. Wilson elected to follow the fortunes of the Mormons through the trial of the Mountain Meadows murderers, and the curious provision which Young made in his will for the comfort of his mortal part after death, instead of branching off into a love story, this would have been a book to set beside Frank Norris's "Octopus"—and there are very few modern novels that deserve a place on the same shelf. It is not that there is any objection to be urged against the love story in itself, but there are so many of them. The term "novel" is regarded as only a synonym for love story, and love stories are all so much alike. Joel Rae is the central figure—the hero, if there is a hero—of the story, and fanatical mystic that he was, he was not without his heroisms. We are introduced to him in the first years of his manhood, as he returns from a missionary expedition, to find the city of Nauvoo deserted and his fellow-religionists driven into exile. Joel is the child of a fanatical father, one peculiarly susceptible to new religious teachings, who "in 1828 had hailed Dylkes, 'the Leatherwood God,' as the real Messiah. Then he had been successively a Free-will Baptist, a Winebrennerian, a Universalist, a Disciple, and finally an eloquent and moving preacher in the Church of Christ of the Latter Day Saints." As a child Joel had taken part in all the marches from place to place as the Mormons had been harried. He had seen the destruction of their villages and their property, and had even seen his own, only sister made the victim of mob violence. Little wonder then, that with his inheritance and his training, he became a shining light of the sect called by the Church Poet "The Lute of the Holy Ghost," an ardent believer in the doctrines promulgated by the leaders, given to fasting and vigils, and ready and anxious to sacrifice everything to the cause of the religion which he believed was the cause of God. However much and more justly the Mormons may be blamed for their crimes, there is no denying the heroism of those long marches across the continent, where their path was marked by a double line of graves. Nothing short of religious fervor could have sustained those hand-cart parties in their desperate fight against disease, cold and starvation, and it reflects little credit on the Christian churches that people who were so earnest in their seeking should have been left to fall into the hands of charlatans. The migration of the Nauvoo settlers, their temporary abiding place in Iowa, the long march across the continent, the first winter, the hand-cart party, the resistance of the United States troops, the Danites and the massacre at Mountain Meadows are a few of the larger subjects graphically dealt with. The institution of plural marriages, the baptisms for the dead, the endowments, and the shrewd and canny dealings of the second president, with the tragedies and comedies of individual lives, round out the story. Whether or not Joel Rae had an exact prototype, there must have been many such amongst the early Saints, or they could never have carried their projects through. How and why "The Lute of the Holy Ghost" became "The Little Man of Sorrows" must be left for the reader to discover. It will be sufficient to say that the author has adhered substantially to facts in his denouement, and that the participation of the Mormons, disguised as Indians, in the Mountain Meadows massacre was finally discovered, long years afterwards, by the recital of childish recollections of two of the survivors, children who were supposed to be too young to notice or remember. No matter what works of fiction make their appearance during the next six months, "The Lions of the Lord" is certain to hold its place as one of the important books of the year. It ranks as high above "The Spenders," Harry Leon Wilson's first novel, as "The Spenders" towered above its contemporaries. It is a book that readers cannot afford to neglect, whether they are seeking information or recreation. [D. Lothrop of Boston is the publisher.]

Wilfrid Meynell is to write the biography of Lord Beaconsfield, and in English literary circles there is general satisfaction expressed that the work should be placed in the hands of one so competent for it. It was taken for granted for awhile that John Oliver Hobbes (Mrs. Craigie) would be selected, but the decision in favor of Mr. Meynell is generally believed to be a better one. Wilfrid Meynell is the husband of Mrs. Alice Meynell, whose visit to San Francisco is still a recent event. He is not, however, dependent on his relationship to that lady for distinction, but is one of the best known and best liked journalists of England.

Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding has written a novel of San Francisco life, and it is reported that during her absence in Europe it will be put into the hands of an English publisher. Mrs. Gerberding's short stories, contributed to magazines, are too well known to need comment. The only work of any length which she has heretofore put forth is her boys' story, "The Golden Chimney." That was an exceptionally good piece of work from a literary standpoint, and an unusually good boys' story, in these days of sensation, slipshodness and slang. Judging by that, there ought to be a treat in store for readers when her novel is brought out. The Bookworm.

REFLECTIONS.

Some women think they are virtuous because they guard against all bad impulses that are not agreeable to them.

It is a pardonable hypocrisy which prompts a woman to conceal from those she loves the ill they do her.

Once one learns not to expect, to have is a small matter.

You always find prosy, commonplace people going in for the happy medium in everything. As a consequence they are ineffably dull and tiresome and a bore to everybody, including themselves. —The Cynic.

NOT PERFECT IN DETAIL.

"What a beautiful picture Miss Swelle is in her tulle gown," remarked Mr. Impressionist, at the Smartem dinner.

"No, she is at best but a rough sketch," returned Mr. Meissonierjulien. —The Butler.

A HINT FROM A HAMMOCK.

"In the silly season there is something hypnotic in a hammock," said the sweet young thing, as she swung herself gently and raised one foot in a graceful way that exhibited to the bashful fellow on the grass just a ravishing glimpse of pousse cafe hose.

"I'm glad you like it," he said.

"Yes," she continued, "one speedily feels soothed in a hammock; the warm, fragrant air, sweet with the perfume of roses, mignonette and jessamine, breathes on one like a benediction. The world forgetting, by the world forgot, as though life were gently slipping away, lovingly enwrapped in the tender, eternal peace of a blissful Euthanasia, one feels that in such moments one should sigh for the strength and power of a remembered passion."

"Did I hear you sigh?" he anxiously questioned.

"Alas, no!" was the mournful reply, "the grand passion of my life is yet to come."

Thereupon the young man felt that he needed no further encouragement. —The Lover.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Legatee," by Alice Prescott Smith:

It's a strange thought that the pictures that have been painted and the bridges that have been built, stand for the men and women who have found that they have blundered that life wasn't giving them what they had a right to expect—and who have been too proud to complain.

It is sometimes good to have been lonely when the loneliness is over.

"It is a mistake to assert that a woman cannot keep a secret. The secrets that are entrusted to her she guards sacredly; it is only the ones she has to ferret out for herself that she publishes abroad." —Ina Brevoort Roberts in July Lippincott's.

From "Other Things Being Equal,"

A man need only offer an occasional bumper of a remark to keep the conversation from lagging, when his companion is a woman.

Sleep puts the strongest at the mercy of the watcher; there is a loneliness about it, a silent, expressive plea for protection, that appeals unconsciously.

A second glance always presupposes an interested first.

Only the severe, the great things of life, move slowly.

Dress has a subtle influence upon our actions; one gown can make a romp, another a princess, another a boor, another a sparkling coquette, out of the same woman. The female mood is susceptibly sympathetic to the fitness or unfitness of dress.

A bit of subterfuge that hurts no one is often not only excusable but commendable.

Nothing is more thoroughly expressive than the shaking of hands between men. It is a free masonry that women lack and are the losers thereby. The kiss is a sign of emotion; the hand clasp bespeaks strong esteem or otherwise.

We do not live wholly through ourselves. What is called fate is but the outcome of the spinning of other individuals twisted into the woof of our own making; so no life should be judged as a unit.

Parting is a figure of death in this respect—that only those who are left need mourn; the others have something new beyond.

The Popularity of Lane

This is one of many letters of similar import that have been received at the Town Talk office within the past few weeks:

Editor Town Talk:—Why are you so persistent in your abuse of Franklin K. Lane? If you were wise you would quit, for if you continue your severe criticisms people will begin to think that you have some personal grievance. Mr. Lane may not be the biggest man in the Democratic party, but he is the most available man for the Mayoralty just now. Mr. Hearst made him a big man and an available man by opposing him for Governor. He made a martyr of him and you are doing the same thing. As a sincere and loyal Democrat I want to see the party win out in the coming municipal election. Patronage is the backbone of the party, and if we nominate Lane we can capture the patronage. You are a Democrat, and as such you should not throw stones at one of the party's available men. Lane may not be the best man in town, but he is the strongest Democrat at this moment, so quit roasting. A DEMOCRAT.

The writer of the foregoing is no doubt a job-chaser whose interest in politics is purely of a sordid character. He would be willing to boom a yellow dog for office providing the success of the canine meant a place at the public trough for himself. The popularity of Lane today is due to the fact that most of the shouting is done by Democrats intent upon becoming tax-eaters and who never concern themselves about the character of men selected for positions of public trust. The man of the hour is the man for them, and it doesn't matter by what tricks or arts or by what species of chicanery he achieved popular esteem. Town Talk has never wavered in its efforts to enlighten the public concerning the emptiness of Mr. Lane's claims to public gratitude, and it will continue to deal with him just as it has consistently and perseveringly dealt with all men and measures that threatened to impose on public credulity for the compassing of selfish ends. The attention given to Mr. Lane's political aspirations is prompted by the same spirit that dictated the expose of the unfaithfulness of Mayor Schmitz long before any other newspaper in San Francisco deemed it expedient to shatter the idol of the labor unions. It is the same spirit that prompts the application of the lash to all social pretenders, political fakers or trespassing charlatans who seek to thrive at the expense of public morals and civic virtue. It is generally conceded that Mr. Lane is a most accomplished practical politician. He has kept himself in a job for six years by nursing the friendship of all the corporations that covet special privileges, and by his suavity and uniform courtesy and his masterly control of the seductive glad-hand he has succeeded in steering his little craft along over the surface of the political sea without bumping a single obstruction. True, he was defeated in the gubernatorial race, but he was holding a job all the time, and though he lost he found himself more popular than ever after the struggle was over. The patronage pirates immediately began to boom him for Mayor on the strength of his majority in this city over the man who had threatened to attack workingmen with a pickhandle for asserting their rights. Though he did not receive the support of the Examiner in the gubernatorial campaign, he is assured of its backing in the event of his nomination for Mayor. He is now on friendly terms with Mr. Hearst, who wishes to mollify all disgruntled Democrats, for he is chasing a job himself. At the same time he enjoys the esteem of President Roosevelt who is the only man he eulogized, except himself, while leading the Democratic hosts in the State campaign. He had nothing to say about his associates on the ticket, but he did some capital campaigning for the Republican chief who has since been importuned to appoint him to a high Federal position. So Mr. Lane is a thrifty as well as an accomplished and practical politician, but we do not believe that he is the strongest available man for Mayor, nor do we regard him as a man eminently qualified for the position.

The Worm Has Turned

Apropos the report that the Duchess of Westminster has decided to lead a crusade against the American climbers in London society, one of the snobs of the press, bristling with sycophantic indignation, warns the Englishwoman against carrying out her purpose lest she upset the plans of her country's statesmen for the establishment of a more substantial friendship between the Republic and the Empire. How silly! And yet how significant of the seriousness with which the American snob takes himself! Because it is amusing and entertaining to follow the fortunes of the plutocratic American girl who has purchased a British title with Yankee gold, and to note the purchasing power of the yellow metal among the effete aristocracy of Europe, it does not follow that we are deeply concerned if the envious erect barriers to her progress. We applaud Yankee push and Yankee enterprise wherever they are most strikingly exhibited, and it is flattering unction to our sordid souls when we observe that even social prestige is to be had for the price, which is regulated just the same as in the case of other articles of commerce, but what care we if the expatriated representatives of the American plutocracy are subjected to a royal snubbing for butting in with the persistency that breeds aversion? The good feeling now existing between the Republic and the Empire, and which was accentuated recently by the cordiality with which Admiral Cotton and his men were received in England, will be further emphasized when the Prince of Wales becomes the guest of the nation. Public sentiment is not influenced by the cares and disappointments of our plutocracy. We may sympathize with the Duchess of Marlborough and the other American peeresses who have become personae non grata to the set dominated by the powerful Duchess of Westminster, but we know that they are not to be tabooed merely because they are Americans. It is probably a case of the worm turning. The new rich from America have been flaunting their wealth too ostentatiously in the faces of the old families, and they have also been regilding in London escutcheons that were tarnished by social scandals in Newport, much to the disgust of respectable people who are intolerant of adultery and lightning matrimonial changes. Perhaps it is in reality a moral crusade that the Duchess of Westminster is leading against the exemplars of American degeneracy who have been demonstrating how easy it was to regain lost social honors by a few triumphs among the British nobility.

The Uses of Radium

Scientists are very much interested these days in radium and the practical uses to which it may be put. Some of its most important and hopeful uses are in the field of medicine. It has been most successfully employed in cases of cancer. A case is reported from Vienna of a cancer of the nose that had been unsuccessfully treated by the X-rays and that was completely cured after four exposures of radium. The fact that radium inclosed in a lead box an inch thick and brought near a person in a dark room causes the same sensation as a flash of light on the retina, even when the eyelids are tightly closed, and that it is also experienced by the blind, is attracting the serious attention of medical men, and the successful treatment of many other diseases than cancer may be confidently expected in the near future. There are many conceivable applications of radium that cannot be successfully exploited unless the supply of the radio-active element becomes more abundant. Its application for illuminating purposes would be perfectly practicable if it were more abundant. The light available from a grain would probably be equal to several candlepower, but one ounce of radium is, at the present rate of supply, worth seventy-five thousand dollars. The possibility of being able in the future to control and store the energy of radium and to liberate it for use as required at any desired rate is the most interesting feature of radio-activity at the present time. All efforts to increase its activity or make it supply its energy at a faster rate have signally failed.

Stiles, the Deliverer

Dr. Stiles, discoverer of the parasite Uncinaria Americana, generally known as the hook worm or germ of laziness, has not been idle since last December when he made known to the world the effects of the ravages of the hook worm on social, industrial and economic conditions in the South. He has been prosecuting his researches in the parasite world as assiduously as ever, and he has made another discovery which is considered by Government savants as of the greatest importance. This is the discovery of the Agamomermis Culicis, otherwise known as the mosquito destroyer. This parasite kills millions of mosquitoes each year, and it is believed that under artificial propagation it will prove far superior to any means now known of ridding infested communities of these pests. There is no doubt that Dr. Stiles has discovered a mosquito-destroying parasite. The discovery was made after many experiments ordered by the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service, and if he will now discover a rapid and inexpensive method of propagating the parasites in sufficient number for general use in marshes and ponds he will be hailed as a public benefactor from San Rafael to Jersey City. The campaign recently inaugurated against this most unpopular of all the singing birds has miscarried absolutely. The use of kerosene in pools has killed some cows, but the mosquito is louder, more penetrating and even more strenuous than ever before. There is balm for the victims in the knowledge that Dr. Stiles has discovered a parasite which has its habitat in the abdominal cavity of the deadly songster, and which invariably puts the blood-sucker out of business. Dr. Stiles taxes credulity, however, when he states that this parasite kills millions of mosquitoes each year. It has always been popularly believed that the death rate among mosquitoes is exceedingly small; that when they disappear it is merely because they are hibernating.

The Foreign Language Fad

The question of foreign languages in the schools is again agitating New York, and foreign languages, of course, mean French and German. It is a subject which is forever cropping up, like the stones in a mountain pasture. No matter how many times it is settled, there is a certainty that we shall hear from it again, and as such agitations are as contagious as the measles the probabilities are that our local Board of Education will be moved to resurrect the matter. It is popularly supposed that a knowledge of French and German is such an advantage in commercial life that "the poor man's son" is entitled to an opportunity to become familiar with them at the expense of the tax-payer, and the custom has grown up, in any city of consequence, of providing special teachers, at high salaries, to impart the instruction. At one period every school in San Francisco was provided with a corps of high-priced assistants, and as much time was devoted to the acquiring of foreign tongues as was given to any of the standard branches of education, yet, after children had passed through the eight years of the grammar school and the three of the high school, there was not one who could carry on a conversation, write a simple letter, or read an elementary book in either language, unless the school instruction had been supplemented by private teaching and the home language had been French or German. In most instances it was simply so many hours wasted. It is perhaps natural that German and French parents should desire their children instructed in their own language, but they have no other or better right than Italians, Huns, or Irish to demand that a portion of the public funds shall be diverted to their use, and if they are really desirous of having their children grow up bi-lingual they are much more likely to attain the result by employing private instructors. If the cost comes directly from their own pockets they will see to it that something is accomplished from the outlay. The public school is no more under obligation to teach foreign languages than it is to endow pupils with beauty. No doubt it would be a great advantage to graduates to understand not only French and German, but music, painting and sculpture as well; and a trip to Europe, a well-equipped manufacturing business, a fully stocked store or an endowment of a million dollars would also be acceptable, but while the complaint is universal, north, east, south and west, that after the pupils have attended school for twelve years or more, and been fed on all the fads and fashions, they leave the high schools unable to write a grammatical letter, to spell common words, read a page of print acceptably, or conduct themselves in a civilized manner in public places, it would be more to the point and purpose to drop the discussion of accomplishments and do some hard digging on the essentials.

The Reading Habit

It seems to be a source of never-ending grief to some of our editors, literary and otherwise, that there are still left amongst us an appreciable minority who don't, or won't read. It is true enough that if people really wanted to read they would make time for it, but why should they want? What special virtue is there in forever staring at print? If some people prefer to whittle or whistle, what harm is it doing the body politic? There is just as much reason and common sense in the whittlers and whistlers organizing a crusade against the readers as there is in the readers keeping up a continual din because every one is not to their way of thinking. Reading for some definite object, carrying on a course of study or investigation, is the proper thing for those who see some benefit or profit in it, but reading to fill time is no more of a virtue than chewing gum or crocheting tidies. The non-readers are far more apt to be the independent and original thinkers. "To mind the inside of a book is to entertain one's self with the forced product of another man's brain." "Mr. Dooley" has made countless apt characterizations and nut-shell descriptions, but he never hit a nail so squarely on the head as when he described a certain kind of reading as "near-think." "Reading maketh a full man," but the quality of the filling needs to be taken into consideration. Is any one benefited by giving up a day in the open air, or an evening of amusement, in order to pour over the latest "best-seller"? Who profits by reading under compulsion, merely because "everybody" is pretending to be absorbed in some book, and no one has courage to say it is not worth wasting time on? Why should any rational man or woman be ashamed to own to having not read "David Harum" or "The Englishwoman's Love Letters"? Instead of urging every one to read, there is dire need of some process of selection and elimination which shall cut off certain excellent people from a knowledge of the alphabet. People who cannot think cannot determine whether or not others can think for them, and much as has been preached about the filling of insane asylums with the victims of drink, there are just as many victims of the reading habit, either confined or on the verge of it. There is a large percentage of fairly schooled people in every walk of life who are not educated because they are not capable of absorbing education. They parrot their way through schools and even colleges, but they can neither think nor discern thought when they encounter it. They take up pamphlets and papers and books and are enraptured with the words poured out in an endless flood, and they fall ready victims to the fakers. Better that they should have been hewers of wood and drawers of water all their lives than that they should have been given the husks of an education without the natural capacity to make use of it.

The Universal "Don't"

Some industrious compiler in England has set about getting up a Woman's Library of "How It Is Done," in which women who have attained to some degree of skill in arts, sciences and trades have been impressed to tell how they have succeeded, "for the encouragement of others." As is naturally to be expected, the majority of the successful couch their advice to ambitious imitators in the single word made famous by Punch—"Don't." Mrs. Kendal contributes the paper on stage success, and she, like Clara Morris, Mary Anderson and all the other successful actresses, puts her advice in the largest of capitals: "KEEP OFF THE STAGE." According to Mrs. Kendal, there is absolutely no chance for beginners. There are three thousand experienced actresses in London out of work half the time, and it is hopeless for beginners to expect engagements when they must come in at the tail of this procession. Whatever one may think of the stage as an outlet for talent, the cry of Mrs. Kendal is precisely the same as that which greets the applicant for an opening in every walk of life. It matters not whether the desire is to become an artist or artisan, whether it be intellectual employment or the most prosaic and commonplace of hand work, it is always the same—no chance—avenues crowded—try something else. It is the iterated and reiterated cry of the trades unions—keep away; too many idle men here now. The milliner, the dressmaker and the laundress all have the same complaint of being crowded out. There is one doctor to every six hundred inhabitants of the United States today, and still the medical schools continue to graduate more. The overflow of lawyers is felt on the street railroads, and as to teachers, if all were employed every child in the country would have a private governess or tutor. Heaven alone knows how the army of scribblers manages to pay for paper and lead pencils, and the stenographers and typewriters who eke out a living by helping in housework are legion. If the youth of the world are to be discouraged by the wisdom of their elders, they may as well resign themselves to starvation by the wayside, for there is no occupation in which the supply does not exceed the demand. There is little use in leaving one profession for another simply to avoid the crowd, and looking for the easy place is as hard work as anything else. The consolation of the situation is that most of the workers are only nominally competent. They call themselves artists, carpenters, cooks or what not, but they are not thoroughly capable. There is always room on top, but as the Self-made Merchant reminded his promising son, there is no elevator by which to get there. Of the three thousand unemployed actresses of London who are marshaled by Mrs. Kendal as an army to turn back the aspiring recruit, probably not three hundred are any better fitted for the footlights than they are for the factory, and of the three hundred not a tenth has made sufficient impression on the the tre-going public for them to care whether or not the managers ever give them another chance to tread the boards. Luckily, youth is optimistic and independent. Otherwise there is not one of the arts of civilization which would not be lost in a single generation. It is in spite of opposition, rather than because of encouragement, that the children of today march ahead of the fathers of yesterday.

The Tribulations of Botryllus

Being the Observations of a Scientific Gent on Imperialism and Expansion, the Labor and Trust Problems, Illustrated by the Extraordinary Behavior of the Sea Squirt.

BY AUTOLYCUS.

I am moved, my son, to direct your attention to the biography of Botryllus, the Ascidian, by Professor Francis W. Bancroft of the University of California, an ingenious tractate, published by the California Academy of Sciences.

The life history of Botryllus was observed and chronicled, as Mr. Bancroft tells us, at Wood Hole, Mass., under the guidance and tutorship of the learned Bumpus who there pursues the vagrant radiolarian, the blameless ascidian and other marine beasts of prey at the expense of Uncle Sam.

What is this Botryllus? The unlearned call him a sea squirt. Is he glad to be alive? As to that it is hard to say, for his emotions are crude and indeed Mr. Bancroft has neglected the psychological aspects of his subject. Has Botryllus a mouth? Yes, indeed, so much mouth that Mr. Bancroft speaks of it with high respect as a siphon. He is gifted with a siphon that a man on the cocktail route might envy. Has Botryllus a stomach? Hush; in the more delicate language of science we speak of this organ as the ampulla. It is large and well formed; in fact Botryllus is potbellied, doubtless owing to the inappeasable thirst of his yawning siphon. Where does he live? Stuck to a rock. What is he for? Food for crabs.

Modern science tells us that every animal of whatever grade is endowed with intelligence in greater or less degree. Now it is a distinct blot on Mr. Bancroft's otherwise admirable history that he does not tell us what Botryllus thinks about crabs. Does he, for example, endure agony while being devoured by the crab, or is he filled with delight in the consciousness of duty well performed?

Botryllus, as Mr. Bancroft tells us, has no enemies except the crab, but whether this hostility is merely a matter of appetite or, in fine, rises to the dignity of a personal matter between the squirt and the shellback, Mr. Bancroft, with persistent neglect of the emotional features of his inquiry, does not explain. One might infer, however, that the relations between Botryllus and the crab are strained, because, although Mr. Bancroft says he has no other enemy, yet he is constantly in danger of being smothered by his neighbors, perhaps in the way of kindness. Doubtless all this is only a phase of expansion. The superior race that, in the process of expanding territory, smothers the inferior, is not inspired by enmity. It is all done in accordance with a natural law of growth and nobody is to blame.

Mr. Bancroft watches these smothering processes with a scientific air of detachment, and he finds them "quite dramatic," even as the languid reader of the newspapers is mildly interested in the slaughter of a couple of hundred Moros who may have had the misfortune to be in the way. Thus Mr. Bancroft writes: "There is nothing more fascinating than to watch the waxing and waning of these other species. The rapidity and suddenness with which some forms appear and disappear, sometimes without having been crowded out by competition, is absolutely dramatic. Every man finds his own excitement." The deeps of Mr. Bancroft's emotion are stirred by the hurly-burly of competing sea weeds. "The only salvation," he says, "of the Botryllus colonies seemed to consist in growing rapidly and constantly conquering new territory." That is just the way our modern Imperialists find salvation and it is proper to remember that in all these dramatic processes the best of good feeling prevails. Botryllus and the Imperialist are not inspired by evil passions and are only obeying the law of their growth.

There is another law—the law of combination—which finds hitherto unsuspected illustration in the life history of Botryllus. Thus Mr. Bancroft: "In the case of trusts and labor unions among men intelligent co-operation has produced the same result, abolishing, to a certain extent, competition between the most similar competing units, and producing units of a higher order. Among the fusing colonies of Botryllus we have a similar formation of a higher competing unit, accomplished by the simplest of all means—organic union: and, from the analogy of the other cases mentioned, it is especially interesting that this combination is only possible between the most similar units. There is a nice derangement of epitaphs that leads to an embarrassing confusion of the moral sense." If the Amalgamated Order of Sea Squirts is a labor union we may understand that it is an admirable and beneficial form of combination, but if we are brought face to face with the gigantic National Sea Squirt Company, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, then it is time for the Attorney General to be doing something. It may be that the object of either combination is the same—the restraint of competition—but it all depends on how the thing is done, and Mr. Bancroft's loose, unscientific way of talking leaves the moral sense in a condition of embarrassed perplexity.

It will be seen that we have to thank Mr. Bancroft for some very unexpected entertainment—unexpected, perhaps, even by himself. The purpose of this form of learning has not hitherto been clear. The ponderous literature of biological research has suffered in the cold shade of neglect because none have suspected its entertaining character. The illustrious Haeckel has published a treatise in four volumes weighing thirty-seven pounds on the Radiolarians, near relatives of the interesting Botryllus, and every ounce of it is more absorbing than a historical novel. The celebrated Professor Jacques Loeb, imported from Chicago at great expense, appears to be the only one of the biologists who has been exploited by the newspapers as a means of entertainment. His well-known paper on "Why does a Caterpillar Climb a Tree?" was given as much space as one of Mr. Dooley's political dialogues and was quite as funny.

It has been hinted, not obscurely, that much of this research literature has been devoted to the purpose of advertising. Dr. Jordan of Stanford University, in a recently published paper has this to say:

Too often, indeed, research itself, the noblest of all university functions, is made an advertising fad. The demands of the university press have swollen the literature of science, but they have proved a doubtful aid to its quality. Get something ready. Send it out. Show that we are doing something. All this never advanced science.

We have seen that Mr. Bancroft and Professor Loeb at least serve a nobler and a higher purpose. If they blow a trumpet the music is good. The California Academy of Sciences is doing a grand, good work. It provides a hall where a paper of this sort may be read aloud without fear of personal violence and where the opinion of the audience is not expressed in chunks of old red sandstone.

When
A chunk of old red sandstone took him in the abdomen
He smiled a sort of sickly smile and curled up on the floor,
And the subsequent proceedings interested him no more.

The Saunterer

McDougald May Be the Man

The primaries are close at hand but the allied bosses of the Republican League have not yet agreed upon a candidate for Mayor. Arthur Fisk could have the nomination if he would consent to run, but he prefers to rest for awhile and enter the race for Congress in the Fifth District. The Republican leaders appear to think that Franklin K. Lane will be the Democratic nominee, and they are calculating with a view of selecting a man who would be likely to make it interesting for the city attorney. And there is a sentiment crystallizing in favor of city treasurer McDougald, who possesses strength that it would be hard to overcome. It would be difficult to find a man better equipped for a contest with Mr. Lane, for McDougald is one man in the Republican party who would be sure of support from the workingmen of the city. McDougald is branded with the union label but he does not belong to the demagogic class in which Lane is a shining light. He is one of the toilers, and his first experience in politics was obtained in the position which he now occupies. The Labor Party was anxious to nominate him for Treasurer, but being a staunch Republican he declined to run on the Labor ticket. However he polled an immense vote in the districts in which the workingmen's vote predominated. McDougald is also "a good joiner," and he is especially popular in the order of Native Sons of which he was one of the founders. If the Republican candidate is first in the field, and McDougald should happen to be the man, the probability is that Mr. Lane will change his mind again and conclude to wait for the Federal job to which he expects to be appointed by President Roosevelt.

The Morgue Club Series

There was consternation among the followers of McNab last week when the Post began publishing reports of the meetings of the Morgue Club. Some time ago McNab thought that he could break up the Democratic League which was organized to oust him from control of the machine, by supplying material to the Bulletin for a series of articles ridiculing the men engaged in marshaling the opposition forces. McNab is skilled in the art of mud-slinging, and the Bulletin gave him carte blanche to apply vulgar nicknames to everybody he wished to drive out of the opposition camp. Consequently he managed to make it very unpleasant for people who had no previous experience with such cowardly and contemptible methods. Finally it was decided by the opposition to retaliate, and the "Morgue Club" series in the Post is the result. And the boomerang has struck home. McNab now knows how it feels to have an apt nickname. He has one that will probably stick to him through life. He is called "Morgue" McNab because his friends in the coroner's office have kept him in touch with the cases of dead men whose estates were worth administering upon. In other words some of his perquisites as a boss have come from the morgue. Some of the followers of McNab who were introduced to the public through the Morgue Club series have taken to the woods. They have no appetite for that sort of warfare, and they are disgusted with McNab for having resorted to mud-slinging tactics.

Speaking About Grafters

"I guess it is worth while being a Republican," said a prominent citizen the other day, "because if you are you can be all kinds of a crook without impairing your availability; whereas, if you are a Democrat and become involved in a political scandal, be it ever so small, you are tabu ever after." The observation grew out of a conversation over the contest for control of the Firty-first district, in which Henry C. Dibble is taking a prominent part. This is the same Dibble who figured in the waste paper basket scandal in the Legislature and who has quite a spotted record. Some one else remarked, apropos of the suggestion that Republicans have short memories, that the case of Governor Pardee could be cited by way of illustration, for he figured in a somewhat unsavory mix-up in Oakland, and then somebody wanted to know whether Prison Commissioner Felton wasn't identified once upon a time with a certain Robbers' Roost at Sacramento. Incidentally some one remarked that it would be a long time before a man of Abe Ruef's signal achievements could break into a respectable coterie of Democratic leaders, whereupon a modest individual in the background gave utterance to the familiar "Oh, I don't know—how about Max Popper? He seems to be doing quite well and I distinctly remember when he refused to testify before a grand jury on the ground that he might incriminate himself."

Pardee's Assurance

As Governor of the State, Dr. Pardee is proving himself quite as shifty as he was in the halcyon days of his political prominence across the bay. Some time ago he solemnly assured a friend that he intended "to keep hands off" in the matter of the wardenship of San Quentin. Upon the strength of that assurance the friend consulted several commissioners, and subsequently reported to Warden Aguirre that there was no occasion for him to worry. Much to the gentleman's surprise the Commissioners met and deposed Aguirre, and then it was reported that the change was made at the instigation of the Governor. I understand that Pardee is to be called upon for an explanation, but I have no doubt that he will have one handy.

Such a Gay Time

The social push at the Hotel Rafael is having a most exciting time this summer. Not since the frisky Baron quit promoting gayety at that resort have the guests had so many diversions to engage their attention. One day Mrs. Fred Green gives a luncheon and invites Mrs. Sonntag and a few others. The next day Mrs. Sonntag gives a luncheon and invites Mrs. Green and a few others, and then one of the few others gives a luncheon and invites Mrs. Green and Mrs. Sonntag, and in this way are the festivities kept up from the beginning of the week to the end. Dull Monotony is never permitted to poke his nose into the house, and the only anxiety felt by the guests is over the probability of nervous prostration resulting from the incessant dissipations in which they have been plunged since the opening of the season. Manager Halton, the one-hundred-dollar-a-month representative of the Baron, is the only person at the hotel who does not appear to be enjoying himself. Unlike the Baron he doesn't drink, and he is never seen at the club-house. He is the most harmless hotel manager in the State.

Her Gentle Satire

It is refreshing to find that indefatigable tout, Madame La Bavarde, dealing in purely imaginative satire warmed through and through with the genial leaven of humor. I had always supposed that satire was entirely foreign to her nature, and that she was content to be regarded as the panegyrist of the snoboeracy, but the other day she penned a bit of sarcasm at the expense of her old friend Mrs. Henry T. Scott, who is engaged in rubbing off the stains of provincialism in foreign parts. According to Madame La Bavarde Mrs. Scott was enjoying the hospitality "of famous hostesses in London." The delicacy of the jolt is positively charming. By her vague reference to famous hostesses Madame La Bavarde deftly calls attention to the fact that Mrs. Scott, who is an Englishwoman, is not in the swim of London. If she had been entertained by any famous hostesses their names would have been published. Mrs. Scott would have supplied the social gushers of the local press with the news of her social triumphs if she had scored any. The fact is that her social prestige is confined to Burlingame. Having been born in England of humble parents it would be more difficult for her to achieve social prominence in London than if she were a stranger from America.

The Splurging of Peter

Local society is somewhat skeptical of the news from Newport about the splurging of Peter Martin at that fashionable resort. Among other things it is reported that he is about to spend two hundred thousand dollars in enlarging his Newport home. The acquaintances of Mrs. Eleanor Martin discredit the story. They believe that she paid the premium of a big insurance policy taken out by her son Peter in favor of his wife just before the marriage, but they seriously doubt that even the arrival of a grandchild could induce her to loosen her purse-strings to the extent indicated by the news from Newport. And yet Peter must have come into the possession of a much larger sum of money than he was ever accustomed to handling in this city, for he has surely been a high-flyer since his marriage. He has indeed been giving a very good imitation of a New York plunger, but then the atmosphere of Newport is conducive to prodigality. How unfortunate that it cannot be bottled and sent to this city to tone up the system of some of our young millionaires. Joe Grant could take a cask of it without jeopardizing his fortune, and even Jimmy Phelan would find it a capital stimulant. Jimmy does loosen up occasionally and spend about one-twentieth of his monthly income, and that is about all the splurging necessary to sustain a reputation for liberality in this city.

Some Lightning Changes

The practice of being on with the new love before being off with the old continues to find favor in New York's smart set. News was received the other day of the marriage in London of Mrs. Maud Jaffray Hunnewell and John Stansbury Tooker, and now it is understood that Mrs. Belle Neilson Kemp and Hollis H. Hunnewell Jr. are soon to be married. The lady who became Mrs. Tooker in London was divorced only a few months ago from the man who is soon to wed Mrs. Kemp, and Mrs. Kemp was divorced in last May from Arthur T. Kemp. Mr. Tooker, who married Mrs. Hunnewell in London, was for many years the friend of both Mr. and Mrs. Hunnewell, and was frequently a guest at their house. Thus are two separate and distinct romances supplied in a nutshell. The people that figure therein are representatives of the very creme de la creme of American aristocracy. They belong to that very exclusive smart set against whose rottenness Colonel Henry Watterson launched a jeremiad not many months ago. The lady who was formerly Mrs. Hunnewell and who is now Mrs. Tooker is the granddaughter of the late Edward S. Jaffray, a wealthy wholesale dry goods merchant. Mrs. Kemp who is soon to become Mrs. Hunnewell is the daughter of Mrs. Frederick Neilson, a sister of Mrs. Reginald Claypole Vanderbilt and a niece of Frederick Gebhard. Mrs. Tooker has long been known as the best athlete among women in society.

"So you are going to marry for the fourth time," said the Old Maid to the Dashing Widow. "I should think you had had enough."

"No," said the Dashing Widow, "the taste for husbands is an acquired taste which becomes a passion."

Discovered Appendicitis

Dr. Groebling, who did so much to make the visit of Dr. Lorenz, the great Vienna specialist, out here a pleasant one, has just received a letter from London announcing the retirement from active practice of Sir Frederick Treves, the surgeon who discovered and made known to the world that aristocratic malady known as appendicitis. His monograph on the subject was the first to call attention to the newcomer and appendicitis has been prevalent and thriving ever since. Treves is only fifty years old, an early age to seek retirement for one of his profession. Whether he is retiring on the fortune he has made out of his discovery—for he has received fabulous fees for operating on the King and large numbers of the nobility—or on his reputation and the consciousness of having discovered a great thing for his profession, gossip as yet says not.

King Edward in a Crisis

Dr. Groebling was in London for the coronation and from a close friend of Treves he heard all the details of the operation performed on the King—an operation that caused consternation throughout the kingdom at the time, and for a few days held the royal life in the air. On the eve of the coronation the King was taken suddenly and seriously ill. His favorite physicians all gathered about him in Buckingham Palace perplexed and undecided. Outside all was in readiness for the ceremony of the coronation, the envoys and representatives of all nations were gathered. Inside everybody knew that it was as much as the King's life was worth to attempt the slightest movement. He was told respectfully and resolutely that an operation for appendicitis was absolutely necessary. He ordered the surgeons from the room. Then throwing himself in a chair he burst into tears. He afterward confessed that it was not the dread of the operation that affected him so but the thought of the national disappointment when it should be announced that the coronation had to be postponed. When the King raised his head he saw that Dr. Treves was still in the room. "I told you all to retire," said His Majesty, reprovingly. "I thought it best for me to remain," was the quiet reply, "to tell Your Majesty that the operation must be performed in order to save your life." In a little while he had obtained the King's consent and appendicitis had risen to the dignity of being a royal disease—it had postponed a coronation.

Carried Out the Suggestion

A group of well known men were discussing the influences of mental suggestion on certain temperaments the other day when Dr. D'Ancona offered the following anecdote to illustrate the text: On a visit to the city, one day, Tom Ricketts, a Nevada mine owner, thought he would drop in and see what Mrs. Whitney, the clairvoyant, could tell him about his surroundings and his prospects in the mine. In reeling off the seance she told him that in the near future he would be cutting his corn with a razor when the instrument would slip and he would have trouble over the wound and lose his leg. Ricketts did pamper the habit of trifling with a pet corn with any instrument in sight. Several months after the seance he seized a razor to pare his torment. He nicked his toe and some days later blood poisoning followed and the man lost his foot. Dr. D'Ancona was present during the operation. The coincidence was pronounced a singular one by a number of those who listened to the anecdote but the Doctor declared it was simple enough: Ricketts was made nervous regarding the cutting of his corn by the warning he had received from the medium. He lost his confidence, dreaded a mishap and in this physical and mental condition he really invited the accident when he attempted the act with a sharp razor. It was simply the accomplishment of a mental suggestion on a highly receptive nervous organization.

The Victim of Persecution

Miss Mary Patton, who was for several years head nurse at the County Hospital, has started on a trip to Europe where she purposes studying the methods of the principal hospitals. She has the backing of several prominent people who intend to establish a hospital for her on her return. Miss Patton is a cultured woman, and she has had experience as a nurse in some of the leading hospitals of this country. She is a member of the California Club, and during her trouble with the Board of Health some months ago her friends rallied to her support in large numbers. She had many sympathizers in the Red Cross Society who were familiar with her work at the hospital, and who believed that she was being persecuted by several political doctors. She incurred their enmity by objecting to the reduction of the course of training for nurses, it being the desire of the doctors to graduate certain nurses one year ahead of time. Miss Patton brought the training school at the County Hospital up to a high standard, and it is unfortunate that politics should have interfered with her work.

Her Early Betrothal

Miss Sarah Poett, who passed away at Santa Barbara last week, was at one time engaged to William Lane Booker, then the British Consul at this port, but for some reason the engagement was broken and Miss Poett never married. She was a great beauty in her girlhood, and the youngest of the three daughters of Dr. Poett, who came here in pioneer days. Old-timers well remember the doctor, who was a citizen of the world, never remaining long in one place though he made California his home for a number of years. The eldest of his daughters, Agnes, married W. D. M. Howard, the pioneer merchant after whom Howard street was named. Upon his death several years later she married her deceased husband's brother George, her third matrimonial venture being Henry P. Bowie, who survives her and resides on the old Howard tract at San Mateo. Doctor Poett's second daughter, Julia, became the second wife of the well known pioneer drug man, John H. Redington, and it was with her at Santa Barbara that her sister Sarah passed the later years of her life.

One of the "Martyr" Pioneers

The dailies devoted scarcely a dozen lines to the death of John Breen, which occurred in San Juan last week. Yet "Honest John" Breen, as he was known in Hollister and thereabouts, was one of the few survivors of the ill-fated Donner party, whose history is a part of the pioneer records of our State. Out of the eighty-three persons who were snowed in at Donner lake in 1846 forty-two perished, and of the original party under James F. Reid and George and Jacob Donner that started from Springfield, Ohio, but eighteen lived to reach California. Of these John Breen, son of Patrick Breen, was one. He lived to be seventy-one years of age, but never could blot from his mind those terrible experiences of fifty-seven years ago. The party traveled in the emigrant fashion of that time, with covered teams drawn by oxen, and there were saddle-horses and cows in the outfit. The Donners, Reeds, Breens, Murphys —not the Santa Clara Murphys but another family—C. T. Stanton, John Denton, William McCutcheon, W. C. Graves, William Eddy, Louis Keseburg, Rev. J. A. Cornwall and Col. W. H. Russell were among the emigrants. A very interesting collection of relics of the Donner party constitutes the star attraction of the little town of Truckee. The relics were collected by a pioneer newspaper editor of Truckee and they are on exhibition in his private museum, on a little knoll situated a few hundred yards from the railroad station. Some of the relics were found on the shores of Donner Lake and others were secured through correspondence with survivors of the ill-fated party.

Buds to Debut

Two of the most interesting of the buds to be launched next winter are Newell Drown and Helen Bailey. The Drowns have quite a following in society, and Hibernia, who has been out more than one season, is a prime favorite. Miss Bailey will be especially well received by the army and navy sets, to which she belongs by virtue of her mother's successive marriages into those branches of the service. Maria Woods was the youngest of the beautiful Woods sisters, who were belles of early days. One married John F. Swift and one Charles Torbert. Maria was the last to marry, her first husband being Lieutenant Bailey of the army, who left her a young widow. Later she married a naval officer, who also died after a very short honeymoon. Though Miss Bailey will not be the best dotted among the buds this winter, she will be popular, for she is very charming, and her connections will insure her the entree everywhere, not only in California but in New York and Washington, D. C. One of her cousins, Sheda Torbert, married Valentine Snyder of the government civil service and her cousin Mollie Torbert is Mrs. Kirkpatrick of New York.

The Second Sutton Girl's Conquest

The second of the Sutton girls is now reveling in a romance of her own. A year ago, at the close of the San Rafael tennis tournament, Miss Ethel Sutton surprised her friends by her unexpected marriage with Bert Orlando Bruce. The smitten Orlando had been laying siege at the pretty tennis player's heart for months, but without seeming to make an impression. He had wooed her in the orange groves of the Southland but she said him nay with a persistency that would have discouraged a less ardent swain. He followed her to the fragrant fields of Marin, and renewed his suit in the tennis court, and his devotion was finally rewarded. Miss Sutton's parents were notified after the marriage. And now comes the news that Violet, the other one of the famous Sutton sisters, has yielded her affections to Harold Doeg, the son of A. Hope Doeg, the wealthy Santa Barbara street-car magnate. He first met her in a tournament at Pasadena on July fourth. He sought an introduction and promptly fell in love, and now the engagement is announced. Young Doeg is twenty-five and a handsome fellow physically and temperamentally. He recently returned from a trip around the world. The elder Doeg is possessed of great wealth and is descended from an old and aristocratic English family.

At the Vatican

The will of Pope Leo XIII has been read, and the people who were wondering what disposition he had made of his wealth have had their curiosity appeased. He bequeathed his fortune to the church. Apart from the private funds of the Pope the Vatican treasures are almost limitless. With its seven thousand rooms the palace is a storehouse of the priceless in art and literature. It also contains much gold. Tons of gold poured into the Vatican during the jubilee year of Leo's priesthood in 1888, and it was estimated that the total value of the jubilee gifts was fourteen millions. One of the most notable was a diamond from President Kruger. Another was a topaz on which the Neapolitan artist Ardica Carletto had spent twelve years in engraving a representation of The Last Supper. This gem alone is valued at eighty thousand dollars. During the week the prophets of the press have been trying to tell us who will be the next Pope. Not one of them knows anything about the matter. Their speculations are about as trustworthy as the recurring assertion that Cardinal Gibbons is a candidate for the pontificate. Nothing will be known of the identity of Leo's successor until the Cardinals have thoroughly canvassed the condition of affairs in church circles throughout the world. The cardinals are more interested in the church and the Papacy than they are in the personality of the next Pope. The prophets of the press are sublimely ignorant of the considerations that move a conclave of cardinals in the selection of a Pope.

The Boscoreale Paintings

According to a despatch from New York, a few days ago, the famous Roman frescos from the villa at Boscoreale have been purchased for the Metropolitan museum. James Fitlock, an English archaeologist who recently visited this city, gave me some interesting information about those paintings when they were offered for sale some weeks ago at auction in Paris. The auctioneer first offered the collection for one million six hundred thousand francs, but no bidder appeared, so they were probably bought piecemeal for the New York museum. They were discovered in 1894 when excavations were made at Boscoreale on the slope of Vesuvius, a short distance from Pompeii. They were found in a luxurious patrician villa which commanded a magnificent view of the bay. It was decorated in the most artistic taste, the walls being covered with beautiful paintings. The supposition is that at the time of the eruption the house was being repaired, and all the furniture had been taken out. The frescos were cut from the wall and sent to Paris by special train. The most valuable paintings were found in a room which was in the hands of the masons when the eruption came. The centre panel represented Venus with Cupid on her knee, the pose being that of the Venus of Milo. Behind her was a painting of two temples on the seashore with statues of gods on one side and Psyche with fishing cupids on the other. The left hand panel represented the loves of Bacchus and Ariadne and the right hand one represented the three Graces. In these pictures the Metropolitan museum has obtained an invaluable aid to the study of painting, both ancient and modern. Mr. Fitlock says that they outclass the Pompeii frescos at Naples.

Stockton's Gay Lothario

The news of Harry Hewlett's escapade in this city caused quite a sensation in Stockton, and the tongue-wagging over the scandal has been strenuous. Hewlett is one of Stockton's fastest young men, and he has long been known to fair femininity in the little town on the banks of the slough as a very passionate lothario. Nevertheless the daughters of Stockton's elite have never underrated his eligibility, and several of them have lavished smiles of encouragement on him even at the risk of exciting unpleasant gossip. One young woman who became a bride not long ago was the object of Hewlett's ardent attentions for a time but it is said that her father interposed in such an emphatic manner as to end the friendship. However, the Stockton gossips do not credit the story from San Francisco in all its details. They say that Hewlett has been very friendly with the girl for over two years. Hewlett is the nephew and not the son, as was stated, of the late Stockton banker. And incidentally it should be stated that he did not inherit a red cent of the old gentleman's money. H. H. Hewlett's fortune was divided between his young widow and his daughter by his first wife. He inherited a little money from his grandmother but he has never been known as a plunger.

Dr. Maurice O'Connell has returned from his trip to the Hawaiian Islands, and will resume his duties as organist at St. Ignatius church tomorrow. It being the feast day of the Jesuit order, special services will be held.

When Markham Was Photographed

It is reported that Edwin Markham, the poet, contemplates returning to this city. The author of "The Man with the Hoe" was lionized as a celebrity when he first went East, but as he has failed to do anything in New York which appeared to warrant the enconiums bestowed on him before he arrived, he is no longer taken seriously. The fact is that Markham is a poseur. He was regarded as such in this city long before he wrote the poem that brought him fame. One day he entered a local photograph gallery and said to the photographer, "I don't want to be dictated to as my expression and pose. A man of my personality can best reflect himself through his own spiritual attributes." On having thus lucidly expressed himself he went forth prepared for a sitting. When the time came for the ordeal he appeared with his wife and a volume of his poems, and after striking what he considered a becoming pose he commanded his wife to read while he turned his gaze inward upon himself. The conventional number of negatives were taken, and as the poet gathered up his things to go he said, "Have these made up for me and sent to my address. I will not charge you anything for the privilege of selling my pictures, and I shall only ask for half of the profits on the sales." So saying he took his departure while the photographer gaped in speechless wonder.

The Poet's Nerve

When Markham went to New York he was taken up by the management of McClure's, who wanted to exploit his work and find out how much there was in his genius. So one of the editors, after the manner of the Spanish grandee who says cordially but figuratively, "The house is yours, senor, do as you please with it," remarked, "I hope while you are in New York, Mr. Markham, that you will be sure and make McClure's your headquarters." The editor little knew how literally he would be taken or he would never have spoken so rashly. The day after Markham's arrival he was availing himself of the opportunity and occupying a chair in the McClure establishment. He seriously blocked the world's output of fiction by telling endless stories to the readers, and before many days had passed every boy in McClure's had an ax out for the Man with the Hoe. One day an assistant found the great gray poet writing letters at a desk and he said in a tone of sarcasm, "There's a stenographer in the other room, Mr. Markham, and I'm sure we would be pleased to have you dictate all your letters to her and have them sent away on our stationery." The next day he was found at the elbow of the stenographer, busily dictating voluminous letters to his friends, acquaintances and admirers. Not long ago an aspiring undergraduate of one of our universities sent a bundle of original verse to Markham for criticism. Markham kept the rhymes for awhile and then sent them back with a letter full of ponderous praise. He did not advise the young poet to grow a beard, but he lined out for him about all the other stunts that he, Markham, had done before entering the House of Fame. He said a lot about the Muse, but unfortunately failed to offer any real, practical criticism on the California stripling's faults of style or choice of subject. But he closed the letter by remarking that the work was almost as good as he, Markham, had done at the young poet's age and that he hoped a lifetime of serious contemplation of the true, beautiful and grand would make the young man a credit to his State and his country.

That Funny Feeling

At a recent dinner in Chinatown the Chinese Consul discoursed on love, and he told how a certain mandarin once determined to bring up his son in perfect innocence, in ignorance of women. Accordingly he dwelt with the boy on a mountain top, and taught him to love the gods and to fear those evil spirits and devils that molest mankind. The boy grew to manhood without being aware that women existed. He reverenced all the gods and he hated all the devils. One day his father permitted him to accompany him down the mountain, and by ill chance they met three maidens. The youth regarded them with profound interest.

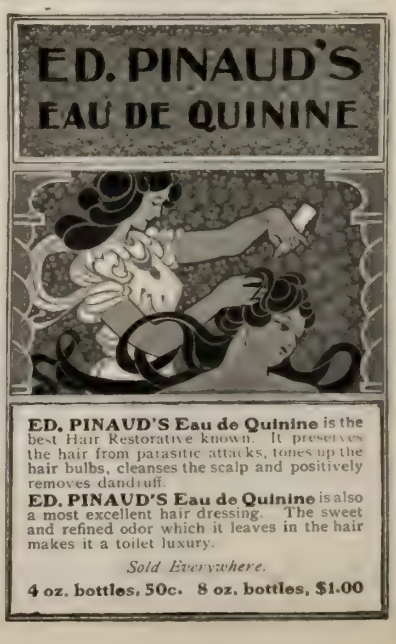
"What are they, father?" he asked.

"They are devils, my son; hate them."

From that moment the boy became melancholy. He could not eat and he was continually sighing.

"My son," his father asked him one day, "what is the matter with you?"

"Oh, father," the young man exclaimed in a tone of sadness, "that tallest devil! that tallest devil!"



"What a nice quiet baby," said the Genial Bachelor to his friend's wife. He was anxious to make himself agreeable.

"Yes," said the proud mother, "the little fellow seldom cries."

"Rapidly getting over the distemper, I suppose," said the Genial Bachelor.

The Cheney Double Shuffle

Now it is asserted that Mrs. John Vance Cheney is about to marry again. I was much amused on reading in the report of the marriage of John Vance Cheney, that Miss Hope Cheney, the "sister of the groom," sent a lovely present. Miss Hope Cheney happens to be the groom's daughter. His only other daughter died a few years ago and from her death dates the estrangement of the Cheneys. Mrs. Cheney will of course marry a wealthy man and take the place socially which she is so admirably fitted to adorn. I am always glad to see a glad right and left—not that I love divorces, but if people must become dissatisfied and call for a new deal, I like to see the partner who is left seek consolation as well as the more progressive one who moved on.

The Midsummer Jinks

There was a rehearsal last week in the red room of the Bohemian Club of the high jinks program for the midsummer jinks. The libretto by Louis Robertson is the finest verse ever yet spoken at a club jinks, and this Aztec affair is expected to eclipse even Fred Somers's beautiful Buddha jinks in the grove below Tamalpais. Louis Robertson, sire of the high jinks, has issued the following invitation to the members:

BOHEMIANS:

When Cynthia, garbed in all her silvern splendor, climbs through the cloudless August night over our classic grove.

Beneath the Titan trees we hope to show
How mighty Montezuma faced the fate
That left him throneless, thralled and desolate
In Cortez' clutch four hundred years ago.

Upon a victim's breast shall glow—
A War God's favor to propitiate;
And you shall hear the priests and prophets prate
The princely Aztec's doom and overthrow.

There Aitken's able genius shall unfold
A gorgeous spectacle and ghastly rite;
While Stewart's matchless minstrelsy is rolled
To where the star-bedizined Dome of Night
Sends back an echoing chorus; while your sire
Lends to the scene and song an answering lyre.

Dr. Shiels, who was first chosen to sire the low jinks, is to take prominent part in the Aztec music-drama. Porter Garnett, therefore, was prevailed upon to sire the low jinks and in his invitation he has parodied Mr. Robertson's verse thus:

P. S.—BOHEMIANS:

When Comus, gorged upon the Sylvan Supper, reels through that sleepless August Night in our Expensive Grove.

Before the Tight on Sprees pass out, WE'll show,
How mightiest Mazuma faced the Fate,
That left him speechless, stalled, disconsolate,
To dine upon "the Figurative Crow."

Within a Victim's Tum a Pang shall grow,—
The Dining-Room Committee he'll berate,
And you shall hear us knock and kick and prate,
And Sense, at last, acknowledge overthrow.

In making our ingenious Tale unfold,
With gorgeous Spectacle and ghastly Sight,
McCoy's mad Melodies, by Tourists trolled,
Will biff the Bot-bedizined Bar at Night,
Whence back an echoing Chorus tells your Sire
That he who wrote the Scenes and Songs's a Liar.

A Genuine Belle Won

On May ninth there appeared in these columns a paragraph predicting that the engagement of Clement Tobin and Miss Russell, the blonde step-daughter of Eugene De Sabla, would soon be announced. So another one of my predictions has come true, for the engagement was announced on Tuesday last. I saw the betrothed pair enjoying a tete-a-tete in the Palace Grill last Sunday afternoon. They gave a very interesting exhibition of soft eyes looking love to eyes that spoke again. Miss Russell is the daughter of Mrs. De Sabla by her first husband, who is engaged in the shipping business. Mr. De Sabla, who by the way made quite a fortune out of the Bay Power Company, married Mrs. Russell in Guatemala. Miss Russell is one of the most attractive young women in society. She is not only a cultured girl but she possesses real physical charms. She is not one of the "beauties" written about by the gushers of the daily press who discern pulchritude in every representative of the elite even when it is not revealed. She is so much prettier than the picture of her published by the Examiner that she has cause of action against that journal. Like Mrs. "Joe" Tobin she is divinely tall, and she is also divinely fair, and she looks like a girl who has had lots of outdoor exercise. Clem Tobin is one of the Hibernia Bank Tobins. He is an attorney of ability and possesses qualities that have won him many friends. Both the young people are deserving of felicitation on having made a very fine match

Waggish Witticisms

The North Shore railroad has had its name changed as a result of the string of accidents that followed one another in quick succession. A wag over in Sausalito referred to it one day as the Not Sure road and the commuters have been calling it that ever since. In this connection I am reminded of the designation given by a wag to the big railroad building at Fourth and Townsend streets. It was at the time that General Manager Krutschnitt of the Southern Pacific gave voice to the theory that railroad accidents come in cycles, and that they are as far beyond human control as the heavenly bodies. One day a stranger, pointing to the big structure at Fourth and Townsend asked, "What building is that?"

"That," said the wag, "is Krutschnitt's cyclery."

Oakland Bored Her

The friends of Camille D'Arville's husband, Mr. Crellin, say that he is very discontented over his wife's inability to reconcile herself to a domestic life in Oakland. He was in her dressing-room the night she opened at the Tivoli, and he could not be induced to sit in the house and watch her performance. When they married it was understood that she would leave the stage as soon as she filled certain contracts, and she did make an ineffectual attempt to content herself in Oakland, where her husband's relatives tried to entertain her. But Oakland society from Arbor Villa to the Mole is a dreadful bore. The discontented prima donna yawned in her hotel day after day and she finally went East and entered a vaudeville house. After a brief season she returned to Oakland and braved the monotony once more. But it was too much for her. She thirsted for the plaudits of her admirers and once more she was thinking of going East, when the Tivoli engagement was offered and accepted as a compromise.

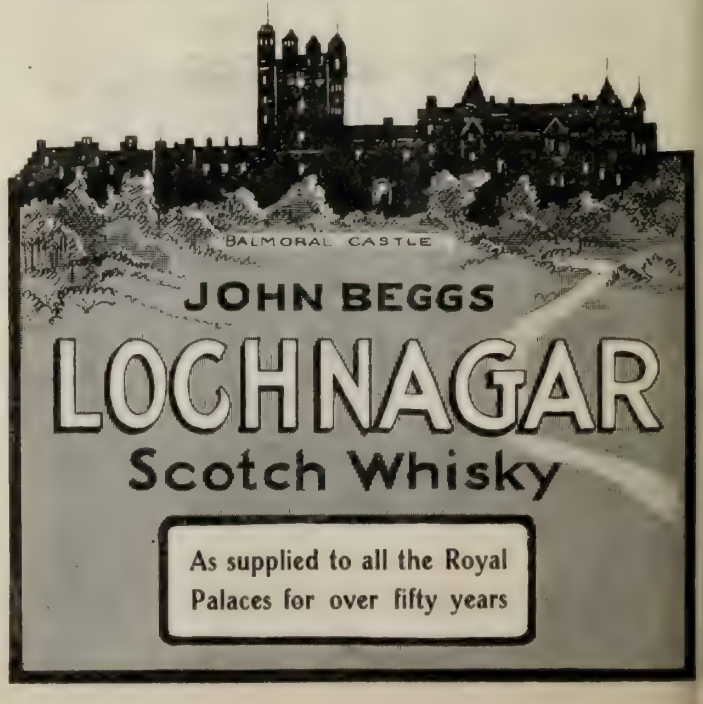
Cunningham's Big Hit

Camille D'Arville's defection from vaudeville to return once more to comic opera has served to draw attention to the fact that the Tivoli has been harboring an actor who is eminently qualified for the exploitation of Irish characters. Camille D'Arville is the bright, particular star of "The Highwayman," but Arthur Cunningham scores the hit of the performance and more than divides the honors. He plays the Irish soldier of fortune in a rollicking manner and with a Celtic brogue as good as Neely O'Sullivan's. If ever Cunningham should cease to devote himself to heroic Irish roles, he would surely find them profitable. And, by the way, if the Tivoli management should care to revive "Shamus O'Brien" it would not have to import an actor or singer for the title role.



Man Hunting in the Sierras

The wholesale prison delivery at Folsom has its amusing side, for it is only a week or two ago that the New York Tribune devoted a double page to the exploitation of this model institution where prisoners were treated with such humanity, permitted to talk freely, smoke, indulge in athletic exercises, and enjoy all the freedom of a college. It was praised as a shining example of modern humanitarian methods, and Eastern "reformers" were loud in their laudation. Now, behold! these model prisoners of the model prison have comported themselves just like ordinary criminals under the same circumstances. When the credulous warden, guards and other officials had been converted to the belief that they were safe from outbreaks because under their gentle influence the leopard had changed his spots, things turned out precisely as any one but a reformer would have predicted. And it would not be surprising if we were to have another period of outlawry such as followed the Evans-Sontag episode and the Tracy affair. At this writing the fugitive convicts are reported to have eluded their pursuers, and yet at one time they were supposed to be surrounded by a company of militia, numerous sheriffs, scores of mountaineers, several prison guards and a few heavily-armed heterogeneous posses. The chase has had its amusing features. The man-hunters have pursued one another and they have fired at one another. There are so many of them that they have diverted themselves from the trail of the fugitives. The employment of the militia in the chase has imparted to it a burlesque aspect. In a few instances when the convicts were sighted the sheriffs sent for the militia and by the time the soldiers arrived the fugitives had disappeared. One day the soldiers wandered far from their base of supplies, and they were obliged to halt until a wagon-load of refreshments overtook them. Meanwhile the convicts were lost in the mountain fastnesses, and the Superior Judge of Sacramento, who sentenced one of them some years ago, was so scared by the report that the fugitive was coming after him for revenge that he barricaded himself in his home and sent for the police. Surely there is material enough in all this for a very lively comic opera.

Cowardice Aided the Convicts

It is to be hoped that when the Prison Commissioners collect their thoughts and finish reviewing the situation they will discharge the horde of incompetents at Folsom, and employ a warden and a few assistants who can offer something beside political activity as evidence of their qualification for the performance of the duties involved. There was nothing novel in the method employed by the convicts to make their escape, and it would have been just as easy for them to have accomplished the feat under the circumstances, even though the prison were enclosed by a wall. They made their escape by reason of the timidity of their jailers. A similar attempt was made some years ago at San Quentin and it was frustrated by the prompt and courageous resistance of the guards. The convicts in Nevada's penitentiary also tried the same trick once and were beaten. The warden and his guards at Folsom quit fighting as soon as they saw that resistance involved a little danger. Men employed in such positions are supposed to be possessed of a backbone. If they are without it they should seek a more congenial atmosphere.

A Clerical Wit

Over at San Quentin the spiritual welfare of the prisoners is entrusted to a clergyman who is not without a sense of humor. Recently W. F. Venter, one of of the managers of the Chautauqua held at Pacific Grove, sent out a letter to all of the ministers of the State asking their co-operation in making the event a success, and that they urge their church members to attend. He did not know that the San Quentin minister was the prison chaplain until he received the following letter:

"Sirs: Accept my sincere thanks for your kind favor of the twenty-third inst. with reference to Chautauqua Assembly at the Grove. I would be pleased to attend if possible. As to my numerous constituency represented here, it is but fair to say that while doubtless willing—nay, even eager—to lend the inspiration of their presence to the occasion, circumstances over which they have no control compel me in their name to decline the same. I will of course announce it to the congregation; but really fear it will do no good as they labor just at this time under great impediment, if not actual restraint. Kindly excuse them, or if persistent, address His Excellency, the Governor, who alone exercises discretionary power in this instance. I fear, moreover, they would be of but little 'help,' as you indicate, for while laboring under deep 'conviction' and not infrequently to 'prey,' I fear the manner and quality of the same would not always be acceptable. In short, would be more appreciated in the breach than in the observance. It would be absolutely useless for me to 'suggest the name of a suitable person to act as agent for the sale of tickets' here; this is the only place in the State where commissions have no charm. Believe me, my dear brother, very truly yours, A. Drahms.

Society Agitated in Oakland

Some of Oakland's veteran society patronesses are in a flutter over the report that there is to be a merger of the Maple and Friday Night cotillion clubs. The social pilots are of the opinion that the swaddling clothes and teething ring set should not mingle with their elders in the realm of Terpsichore. They appear to be afraid that if Oakland's swagger clusters were invited, the malted milk youngsters of the Maple Club would be lured to the punch bowl's brim in Reed hall, for be it known they do dispense exhilarating liquid at the social functions of the Friday Fortnightly Club. Then there is also the danger of some of the eligible beaux that impart zest to the Friday Fortnightly affairs being captured by the chic belles of the Maple Club.

An Awakening

The Silurians of Oakland have had an awakening, and there is talk across the bay of spending a lot of money in public improvements. A few esthetes have started agitation in favor of beautifying the little town, and they have decided to prohibit the dumping of garbage at the Sixteenth street entrance. A few of the inhabitants believe that it is possible to metamorphose the sleepy village into a genuine Athens, and they point with pride to the new boulevard that skirts the Merritt frog-pond as evidence of the fact that a beginning has been made. It is such a broad highway that a society leader demonstrated the other day that he could execute a figure eight on its surface in his auto-touring car without necessitating a call for a Whitelaw wrecking crew. There are rumors that the Lakeside set are threatening to loosen up, the Adams family having given evidence of good faith by investing in a hothouse stuffed with palms.

Mrs. Willis G. Dodd returned from her Eastern trip two weeks ago. She has spent most of the time since her return at the Sabin country home in Mountain View.

Gossip of the Rialto

People of the stage can never carry on even the mildest of flirtations without being subjected to the public's rubbering and comment. The thespians have to do all their love-making, perforce, before the argus-eyed world which is always unduly interested in anything in which actors and actresses figure. And this is how it has gone along the Rialto that Blanche Stoddard and E. J. Ratcliffe have a "crush" on each other. They dine together every day in a little French restaurant down town where the guests can watch their tete-a-tete, and the inference is that both are deeply epris. The affair began during the engagement of Nance O'Neil at the Grand Opera House, some months ago, when Blanche Stoddard was in the stock supporting the star. Ratcliffe came out from New York to play leads, and he fell in love with the slender, spirituelle Miss Stoddard. The flirtation was cut short when Ratcliffe went on the road with Nance O'Neil's company, but was taken up again when the organization returned to town. Miss Stoddard is a beauty with liquid brown eyes and a tender voice. Those dulcet tones, so goes the Rialto gossip, have also bewitched Charles Millward, the big English actor.

Jordan's Unfortunate Reticence

Two weeks ago I called attention to the fact that, in her address to the trustees of Stanford University, Mrs. Stanford had placed Dr. Jordan in a somewhat embarrassing position by disclaiming all responsibility in the case of Professor Ross. It was not until last Sunday that the dailies discovered the importance and purpose of that address, and it was then, for the first time, that they called attention to what had been expatiated upon in Town Talk a week before. The tardy appearance of the correspondence simultaneously in all the dailies is proof of the fact that somebody was interested in having it published, and that the matter was brought to the attention of the editors. It now appears that Dr. Jordan blundered egregiously in not publicly assuming all the responsibility in the Ross case and airing his views as to the impropriety of the professor's conduct. According to Jordan's views expressed in his private correspondence, Ross was not a fit man for the position he held. Yet people have had the impression all along that he was influenced in his action by Mrs. Stanford, and as a consequence the university was regarded with disfavor.

Was Ross Unfit?

Was it expedient for Mrs. Stanford, in the absence of President Jordan, to reopen the Ross controversy? The nine days' noise of it had long since died away, leaving no more than here and there a faint echo or two. No doubt, the odium of alleged tyranny is hard to bear, even for that heart to which the interests of Stanford University are naturally nearest and dearest. But why all this smoke? Does it not hint of hidden fire and arouse public curiosity as to the precise nature of that fire? There is, so far as I am aware, no college professors' union, before which it is necessary for the employer of intellectual labor to justify himself when he "fires" inefficient or otherwise undesirable employes. To make a public apology for dismissing is to raise doubts of one's right to dismiss. To think it necessary to use euphemistic terms, to style the dismissal of university help "enforced resignation" is, to say the least, un-American. If Professor Ross was unfit to fill a chair at Stanford, ought he to be teaching sociology at Nebraska or giving special courses at Harvard? The distinction between Dr. Ross, professor at Stanford University and Edward E. Ross, private citizen with the right of free political speech, is in the main metaphysical. The priesthood of Father Yorke does not prevent him from being a force in local politics. President Jordan himself made public speeches against the policy of the Government in the Philippines. Did not his position as president give undue weight to his words?

Some Half-Empty Chairs

"At bottom just a dime novel villain"; "a boy without a conscience"—are these the carefully selected words of a conscientious man, written in the pure spirit of science? The public awaits with considerable interest proof of the ten cent villainy. The "boy without a conscience" was certainly not a boy without brains. His "Social Control" has given him a place among the foremost of American sociologists, and no mean standing in France and Germany. This able work is in the true scientific spirit. Read the preface, even. That was never written by a partisan, "a dime novel villain," "a boy without a conscience." The courses of this man at Stanford attracted students with red corpuscles and gray matter. The anæmic nincompoop, on the look-out for "soft snaps," had no use for work with Ross. So marked was this that to dislike Ross as a professor came to be tantamount to a confession that one was cut out for a "flunk." The chairs at Stanford filled by Ross and by Howard are to this day half-empty. The "freedom of teaching" and the "freedom of learning" are not as free today as they were during the days of '95, nor do the "winds of freedom" go whistling as of old through the many-arched quadrangle. This may be due to the natural tendency of institutions to grow conservative. Mrs. Stanford's exposition does not expose. What is written between the lines leads the reader to believe that the real reasons for Dr. Ross's dismissal have not yet been made public. In the meantime the "boy without a conscience" is getting to be "a man among men."

Training for a Foreign Mission

President Benjamin Ide Wheeler's qualifications for becoming a diplomat in the patriotic service of his country in case it is found "convenient" for him to give up his position as president of the State University is receiving that careful consideration among his friends which the momentous question deserves. They all agree that he is willing to serve if he can get a job which will enable him to sufficiently exploit his brilliant talents; at the same time they believe he must find an angel as benign and kindly disposed as Mrs. Hearst to defray his expenses. It is conceded by his staunchest partisans that Mrs. Wheeler would adorn a diplomatic position abroad more fittingly than would her ambitious spouse. What could have been more charming than the way in which she entertained the visiting members of the President's cabinet at the time her keen husband was leading the wily politicians in the chase over the State hurdles to keep up in the wake of the lively Roosevelt. That ever memorable event in Berkeley passed off with a mixture of elan and gravity that thoroughly impressed all the gaping town-folks who were fortunate enough to get a peep through the carefully barred doors. I hear that the hostess afterwards remarked that "it was like entertaining royalty." How much more of savoir faire does this betoken than the pithy remark of President Wheeler as he stamped out of the Yosemite snowdrift at the heels of the strenuous First Executive. It cannot be published on the same page, for diplomatic as well as academic reasons.

She Wasn't Piqued

The split in the Southern colony has been growing wider ever since those dear old ladies, yclept Daughters of the Confederacy, agreed to disagree. It has been frequently hinted that Mrs. Van Wyck occasioned the diversion by withdrawing from the original chapter in a fit of pique, and promptly rallying her friends and starting another chapter which she was sure of dominating. This version of the split has been reiterated many times, and Mrs. Van Wyck is no longer complacent. She doesn't like people to believe that she was actuated by pique in starting the new chapter, and so she asked her friend Mrs. Salisbury to set her right before the public. Mrs. Salisbury is most resourceful when plausible explanations are wanted, and she has supplied a very plausible version of the row. She says that it dates from the visit of the wife of the Bishop of Florida. Some of the Daughters of the Confederacy wanted to give her a reception, but Mrs. Van Wyck demurred. Mrs. Van Wyck was overruled and the reception took place at the home of Mrs. Voorhies. Thereupon Mrs. Van Wyck, who was president of the chapter, resigned. Of course she wasn't piqued; not at all. She hadn't the faintest notion of starting a rival chapter; not for a minute. But the national president of the order called on Mrs. Van Wyck and begged her to organize another chapter. Indeed she pledged her to do it. Mrs. Van Wyck was reluctant, but she could not resist the pleadings of the Grand President. Isn't that a very plausible explanation? And doesn't it prove that Mrs. Van Wyck wasn't piqued?

Fearless "Cash" Clay

The dark and bloody battle-ground lost its most picturesque and salient personality the other day when the stormy career of that eccentric old hero, Cassius Marcellus Clay, came to an end. "Cash" Clay was a swashbuckler of the old school, a fighter who figured in many a bloody encounter, a hero who was always ready to shed his blood in defence of his principles, a slashing, shooting aristocrat who was never known to quail before an enemy no matter what the odds were against him. The present generation is familiar with the family troubles that disturbed his declining years, with the sentimental complications that led to the interference of his relatives who sought to have him declared insane, but few there are who can recount the stirring episodes of his early career, episodes as thrilling as any that D'Artagnan figured in, and which served to establish for him a record for bravery that few men in the world's history have achieved. "Cash" Clay was a whimsical chap, but he possessed a noble courage and his virtues far outnumbered his faults. Though of patrician Virginian stock and raised in Kentucky he was a convert to abolitionism, and he was at all times ready to fight in support of his opinions.

Two of His Fights

One of his most notable combats was with a man named Sprigg, a member of the Kentucky Legislature, and a bad man. They exchanged warm words one day and it was expected that Spriggs would challenge Clay. It happened that in a burst of confidence one day Sprigg had told Clay that it was his habit when a fight could not be avoided to approach his man in a conciliatory manner, and then without a declaration of war, swat him. Meeting Clay after the angry discussion, and oblivious of his fatal confidences, he stepped up in a conciliatory manner. Clay knocked him down and kept on knocking him down until Sprigg was dragged away. One of his duels was with Samuel Brown, a big bully who hit him with an umbrella. Clay drew his bowie knife and before he could strike he was seized from behind by a force of men who held him about fifteen feet from his adversary until the latter could draw his Colt's revolver. When released Clay started for Brown, who held his fire until his man was within an arm's reach, and then shot at his heart. Clay came down upon his head with a tremendous blow, splitting it open and stunning him. Brown's friends came to the rescue, but Clay scattered them and they threw the wounded man over a stone fence and fled. Raising his bloody knife, Clay said, "I repeat that the statement made by the speaker before Brown's assault is a falsehood, and I stand ready to defend the truth." Clay started an anti-slavery organ at Lexington once and armed the office with two brass four-pounder cannon to be prepared for mob violence. He also had a keg of powder in his office which he was prepared to explode in the event of an invasion being too hot. There never was a gamer man than Cassius Marcellus Clay.

bride-to-be is Miss Helen Bubb, daughter of Captain Bubb, and the bridegroom-elect Mr. Gerald Street of Chicago.

Major F. H. Hardin, Fourteenth Cavalry, who has been on duty here at the Mint, will leave in a few days for his former station at Fort Wingate, New Mexico. During the absence of Colonel George Andrews in Yosemite Valley Major J. P. Williams of the Artillery Corps has been acting as Adjutant General at department headquarters. Colonel George F. Chase, Twelfth Cavalry, sailed on the transport Sheridan for the Philippines in command of the third squadron of that regiment.

It Was Their Fate

All sorts of things, nice and the other kind, are being said about Colonel T. C. Lobo of the Fourteenth Cavalry, who was the cause of the early break-up of homes at Fort Grant, New Mexico, and the coming of the officers of that regiment and their families to San Francisco, anticipating their departure for the Philippines by the transport which sailed yesterday. By a little delay, it is said, the countermanding orders would have been received in time to prevent the hardship of the move. Among those who are here are Captain Ren Smedburg and Captain Harold P. Howard with their families.

The Phelan Sack

Jimmy Phelan and Gavin McNab were observed engaged in earnest conversation a few days ago, at the corner of Jackson and Polk streets, which is not far from the residence of Mr. Frank Sullivan, the brother-in-law of the ex-Mayor. During all Mr. Phelan's campaigns Sullivan was the man with the dough, or at least he acted as the financial agent of his brother-in-law, and thereby protected the latter from the charge of spending more money for his election than the law allows. When Phelan and McNab were seen together in the vicinity of the Sullivan residence it was immediately surmised that the Phelan sack had been opened. And it evidently had for that night McNab proceeded to dole out coin to his hungry constituents. When asked if he had tapped the Phelan barrel he beamed on his questioner.

Keene's Pyrotechnic Career

When Jim Keene lost one million five hundred thousand dollars in New York last week, through the failure of his son-in-law, he remarked that it was "only a flea-bite." The loss of a fortune is no new experience to James R. Keene. In April, 1884, he suspended payment after losing a fortune estimated at from four to seven millions in six months. Only six years before he had reached New York from this city, where he had met with big success in his speculations, a success that encouraged him to try his luck in Wall street. In this city he had risen from nothing to an estate of a million or so, had lost that in a flash, and then by a succession of bold ventures of the pyramiding type had brought himself to an eminence which carried a rating of five millions when he moved to New York. His first combination was with Jay Gould with whom he engaged in fighting Western Union with Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph. Though they profited in this campaign, he broke with Gould shortly after, alleging that Gould had gone back on his friends and sold them out in the middle of a deal, the very same charge that had been made against himself on this coast.

His Varying Fortune

On the other hand, Gould declared that Keene had played him a shabby trick. It was at this time that Keene expressed the opinion that Gould was the wickedest man in the world. Keene had heaped up his profits in cash and was known to have as much as nine millions in currency when he undertook to corner the wheat market. An attempt to bull Jersey Central stocks conducted at the same time was unprofitable, for the stock went down forty points in one day. Whether he might have succeeded in his wheat corner or not will never positively be known, for the attempt miscarried when a forged telegram was sent from New York to his Chicago brokers ordering them to sell two million bushels of wheat. They threw it on the market, it became known that Keene was selling, and before all the evils were reckoned with, Keene was six millions loser on wheat. However he came back buoyantly a little later when stocks took an upward trend, and fortune's favor returned more lavishly than ever. His wealth on paper rose to twenty millions and his followers hailed him as King of the Street. With his triumphs on the market came his best success on the turf and in 1881 Foxhall carried the white with blue polka dots home in the Grand Prix. With his accumulated millions he went into every game and gradually his fortune forsook him until Guiteau's shot paralyzed the country, when Keene was believed to be in desperate straits. He took to dealing in privileges and he sold them so recklessly that when the market turned he involved himself hopelessly, and that was in 1884, when he gave notice of his suspension. But he got back into the market again and paid all his old debts.

His Love of the Turf

His bear campaigns, to which his natural tastes seemed to force him, were the losing ventures of his recent years. He was assailed bitterly by the Brooklyn Rapid Transit management in 1899 and was charged with being the source of rumors affecting that stock. Again he was credited with inspiring the attacks on the State Trust Company in 1900. Then came his attack on the Metropolitan interests and lately his row with Harriman. Though his specialty is stock manipulation he has always been fond of the turf. Foxhall was the most celebrated horse he ever owned, but Domino won more money than any other horse that ever carried the Keene colors. His stock farm, the Castleton Stud near Lexington, Kentucky, is one of the finest stock farms in the country. There he bred Commando, and Conroy and Cap and Bells. After Cap and Bells won the English Oaks two years ago Mr. Keene divided the purse equally between certain English and American hospitals

During the visit of the Edward Robinsons and S. G. Robinson to the Vendome last week they were the focus for countless lorgnettes. The Robinsons are from Belfast, Ireland, and were guests of Mr. and Mrs. James Hogg. With them was Miss Florence Callaghan. Among the Vendome's visitors are Mrs. L. E. Van Winkle and Mrs. I. S. Bryan and His Defamers

Editor TOWN TALK:

Grant me space for a few more words concerning the defamers of William Jennings Bryan, who is very much in the public eye just now though he is not a candidate for office. Bryan was twice the nominee of the Democratic party for President of the United States, and upon both occasions was defeated by the treachery of so-called Democrats, and the prodigal use of Republican gold. Of course it is an easy thing to say that a leader who has been twice defeated should not aspire to further command. Granted. But Bryan has distinctly stated that he is not a candidate; but he still claims the right to fight for true Democratic principles, even though it be as an humble private in the ranks; but even this privilege will not be accorded him by Democratic traitors and Republican vote-buyers. There are still several million Democrats who are Democrats from principle, who cannot be bought, frightened or cajoled, who are not the abject slaves of Wall street, who are still convinced that freedom's battles are never fought at bankers' banquets, who do not own newspapers, and are not owned by them, and who will thwart this miserable conspiracy to destroy forever the great old Democratic party.

The Springfield Republican, once the mouthpiece of that great editor, Samuel Bowles, referring to Mr. Bryan's present attitude, wants to know what Mr. Bryan is "up to." Bryan has to say in reply: "It is only fair that the readers of The Commoner should know what I am 'up to,' and if they will pardon me for being a little bit personal I will tell them. I have twice received at the hands of my party the highest honor it can bestow, and twice has my nomination been endorsed by our allies, the populists and silver republicans. The first nomination came from the delegates in attendance upon the three conventions. The second nomination came directly from the voters of the three parties. These honors were bestowed not because of personal merit, or as a personal compliment, but because of my advocacy of democratic principles. I still believe in those principles, and expect to advocate them during the remainder of my life. New issues will arise from time to time but the principles set forth in the Chicago platform and the Kansas City platform are fundamental, and can be applied to all questions. I am not planning for another presidential nomination—if I were I would not be editing a paper; if I ever become a candidate again it will be because it seems necessary for the advancement of the principles to which I adhere, and that does not now seem probable. I shall, however, take an interest in politics for several years yet, if I live, and can be relied upon to support those who as candidates advocate democratic principles, and who can be trusted to enforce them if elected. I have no enemies to punish. No matter what a man may have said or done against the ticket in 1896 or 1900, that man becomes my friend the moment he accepts democratic principles. Neither have I any disposition to reward political friends at the expense of our cause. No matter what a man may have said or done for the ticket in 1896 or in 1900, that man becomes an opponent the moment he runs against democratic principles. Political battles are fought not in the past or in the future, but in the present. The heretofore cannot be recalled, and the hereafter cannot be anticipated, but the NOW is all important. I shall say whatever I think ought to be said, and shall write whatever I think ought to be written. This course may not be popular, but I trust that it will aid in the restoration of Jeffersonian principles. I shall ask no reward, because I am not working for others entirely. As a citizen I am interested in having a good government under which I live; as a father I am interested in leaving a good government to my children. If a good government can be secured it will be reward enough for all that I or any one else can do."

Those are plain words uttered by a man who always says what he means. Nobody has ever sought to impeach the honesty of William Jennings Bryan. Why then should his word be doubted? Bryan is respected by Democrats all over this country, and no candidate who would dare abuse him could carry the electoral vote of a single State. Moreover no McKinley-Palmer-Buckner Democrat could be elected. —A Jeffersonian Democrat

One June Day

BY HELEN STRANGE.

"Have a posey, dear?' Ah, the rare, Southern California June day! Max had just come out from the East. I have been luxuriating for weeks in the warm, friendly caresses of this glorious, inimitable, Southern California sun, and am now driving with my dear boy along the enchanting old Temple Road that runs from the busy town to the charming little suburb perched in the hills, some eight miles away.

The road stretches yellow and smooth before us, winding off up through Cahwenga Pass—our destination. Shaggy, shabby, dilapidated eucalyptus trees line one side of our way, and on the other side—see the marvel in Max's face—a boundless sea of madly blooming carnations!

"Have a posey, dear?" and Max reins in his horse. The patient gardener, who seems to have undertaken the gigantic task of harvesting the spicy crop, looks from his monotonous "snip, snip" and smiles at us the good, Californian welcome. "Come down and help yourselves; take all you can carry," is his hearty response to Max's query if we may have a few. But we prefer to sit happily and lazily in our comfortable little buggy and coax the very good natured gardener to gather us a few of the fragrant red, white and pink blossoms.

We blissfully resume our journey, through lacy arches of pepper trees, past picturesque old mission homes, set far back in gardens blooming with a riot of many-colored flowers. "How they do love color, down here!" we agree.

We laugh happily at the notion which has gotten into my head that those quaint old Australian palms, guarding the lares and penates of each old, beautiful home, rearing up straight and lank, with a feather-duster burst of plumage at the tip-top, remind one of nothing so much as a naked youngster with a shock of hair.

I am the guide. I have gone over the way many times in my long, blissful stay in this land of flowers and sunshine, while Max has been spending the winter of his discontent back in the dreary, dirty city of monster pork-packing industries, held in limbo by that mysterious nuisance, business. But now—oh, joy! he has slipped off to bewitching California, to share my marvel and delight in all things the wonder-country has to offer her votives—doubly marvelous and doubly delightful now to me, shared with him.

Off to the west, nestling cozily between two soft green and brown velvet hills, in a grove of ragged old eucalyptus, the happy hoboes of the California race of trees, we shall find an inn, a warm welcome and a chicken dinner, cooked for us by an old, black mammy "from Washington, D. C.," as she proudly announces, hands on hips and head thrown back for the ready laugh awaiting the eager applicant for a bite to eat.

But there are more than two hills confronting us; there is a whole group of them, but only one inn and only one mammy. Which appears to be the right direction? I look anxiously about for some familiar landmark, but all roads look equally inviting and all roads wind off to the mountains. "These roads all look alike," I announce, rather sulkily. "They are all yellow; they all wind; they are all bordered with regiments of hobo eucalyptus, but I think perhaps this is the way," and I point doubtfully toward a piece of road that surely ought to take us to the very spot we are seeking. Our horse, who, no doubt, has taken many other happy lovers over the same sunny way, appears to be satisfied with the direction in which we turn him and we feel quite sure he knows just where we wish to go.

We are on Los Felis street, we are informed by the sign at the crossroads. That doesn't sound just right, and the way grows less and less familiar. The hoboes have disappeared, and in their places respectable fields of oats and barley, and—where are we now? In the midst of a Chinese vegetable garden! I have lost my way, as usual. I am chagrined; Max laughs gently but with distinct amusement: "Your locality bump, Helen, hasn't it grown any, out in this California of yours, where all things flourish?"

Max calls gaily to the "Chink," busily cultivating his cabbages—for they do grow cabbages, as well as carnations, in this fairest earthly garden. "Hi there, John, is this the way to the Pass?" "No, not the way to the Pass," John gently informs us, and sets us right on our journey, back through the cabbages and the oats and barley fields, to the same eucalyptus-lined path we have just so ambitiously left. Ah, now it looks right once more! There is the same group of ancient, native sycamores on the right, and the same clump of scraggy live oaks on the left—we are in the Pass; it is a reality, the inn is a reality, the old, black mammy is a reality, I triumphantly prove to my dear boy, who has been teasingly suggesting for the past few anxious moments that we may not dine this evening. And our chicken dinner will soon be a reality, mammy assures us. "Git right down out o' your kirrige and let Joe take keer your hoss. You-all jess got time to climb that ole hill yander and see the sun set, while I git you' dinner," and she points toward a particularly modest-looking green eminence that seems to bubble up from the ground behind the old inn, the youngest of a large and promising family, in various stages of development, all mothered by a matronly old soul of comfortable proportions, who, even now, is coaxing the sun, her foster child, to sink to his rest on her broad, green bosom. When Max inquires, "Do you think you can, dear?" I eagerly assent, and we start off blithely for our climb. Ah, how young and strong and glad we feel! We bound up the sheep trail, scrambling over stones and beating our way through the thick growth of brush that obstructs the path.

The ascent appears to have suddenly grown steeper, the summit farther off, and the baby hill to have become a promising young mountain.

I grasp a convenient shrub that seems to have grown in just that very place for the express purpose of helping me climb up, but quickly withdraw my lacerated hand—prickers! "Why," I burst out petulantly, "does disagreeable, old Mother Nature choose such an inopportune time to indulge in a poor joke! Why aren't these bushes and shrubs made friendly and smooth to the grasp of the weary traveler, instead of bristling and unapproachable! Suppose we were prospecting instead of merely climbing this great, high peak to see the sun set?" Max only laughs and says, "Another 'Why.'"

I am not so blithe now, and I don't feel quite so strong as I did, but allow willing Max, who is still provokingly fresh, to give the aid so proudly rejected at the beginning of this arduous climb.

We gain the top at last and I sit down on a smooth stone to quiet my fiercely beating heart, while Max looks around for His Majesty, the Sun. If we wish to see him set, we shall have to climb to the tip-top of all the brother and sister hills, who are towering above us on all sides! As we promised Mammy we would return for dinner in three-quarters of an hour, we decide to rest a few moments and then descend. Of course Max takes out his cigarette case and I claim my usual right to hold it while he smokes. It is a rarely exquisite affair of silver, severely plain, with just my dog, "Medoc," in one corner, done in enamel, in rapturous browns and greys, and blacks and whites, and there, on the inner side of his dear white leg, is a suggestion of soft pink!—Medoc, whom Max allowed somebody to steal out of his buggy, some months ago, back home, and whom the best and most experienced dog catcher in the whole town has not yet succeeded in returning to me, albeit my plaintive "Lost" ad. is still running in the Daily Sentinel.

Max looks at me with those kindest, brightest brown eyes, in a way that is rather disconcerting, for I feel hot and towseled and my hand is continually up to my face, seeking for stray locks that may have broken from their moorings. But his glance is wholly admiring, and when he says, "You ought to see yourself now, Helen, your eyes are so bright and your cheeks are so rosy," I am quite content, for Max, who is eight years my senior, had fallen violently in love with a very beautiful actress, while I was away at the Misses Seeley's school, trying to grow up and become an accomplished young woman. Fortunately for poor Max, the metamorphosis from the jolly tom-boy who had roamed the northern woods and sailed the northern lakes with him, to the stunning young woman of whom he seemed to stand a little in awe the first few days of my return, must have been complete enough and satisfactory enough to make him straightway forget his foolish fancy for the beautiful actress and bring him to my triumphant feet, where he is now lounging with all the apparent content in the world. I sometimes wonder if she jilted him. He has never said.

The view from the top of our mountain is entrancing, even without a sunset, and although we are very much in love (at least Max declares he is with me), we are young and happy and healthy, so we proceed, like the king of France, on his famous hill, to march down again. Max thinks he has discovered another trail, one less stony and much shorter. It is less stony, we find, and perhaps it is shorter, but torrents of loosened earth pursue our downward flight, filling my low shoes and disturbing my temper.

Half way down, we gaze longingly at the sight of Mammy, frantically waving her apron at us and shouting: "Come 'long quick; yo' dinner done ready this minit." I try to come quick, with the result that I slip and slide and come tumbling headlong on to Max, who is below, holding out his hand to help me down a particularly steep piece of the trail. We roll into the dry bed of a mountain brook, which at some seasons of the year tumbles joyfully down the side of our mountain. But the bed of the tiny stream is now quite guiltless of water, and we "dryly" scramble to our feet.

We find that our precipitous haste has brought us to fairly level ground, within a few steps of the kitchen garden, which contain peas and beans and other garden truck, and a real lemon tree with real lemons ripening on it.

I limp along after Max, my shoes full of gravel and dirt. What evil prompting causes him to bid me sit on a fallen log while he takes off my shoes to shake the dirt out of them? I do as he suggests with apparent gayety, but in reality in an agony of apprehension. Oh, the slow torture of that moment when the first shoe comes off! Ah, the sweet relief! Not the slightest, tiniest suggestion of a break in the toe of my thinnest silk stocking. "Oh, good, kind Fortune, stand by me in this ordeal, to the end!" And she does, like a brick (a hold-over from my tom-boy days), and both shoes go back on again, my reputation for neatness having sustained not the slightest injury.

I wonder if Max had not heard of the cavalier who went a-wooing and chose the painfully neat maiden who always washed her pan after every bread-baking, and who, consequently, had no scrapings of dough to make a poultice for the leg of his disabled horse.

"Max," I say gravely, and I stop still in the middle of the kitchen garden, while half a dozen fox terrier puppies, who are part of the crop, yelp and leap madly on me, "Max, would you love me just the same if my stockings had needed mending?"

He is laughing at me again and saying: "Helen, I thought you did not look radiantly happy a moment ago, at my solicitude for your comfort." I do believe the wretch was disappointed!

But Mammy is again at the door, urging that our dinner will be "done col'," so we take our seats at a little round table in a cozy dining room, done in old mission style, and proceed to enjoy our well earned dinner, good, thoughtful Max first ascertaining that our horse is equally well provided for.

When our rarely delicious chicken is finished, Max lights another cigarette and I sit in happy content, holding "Medoc" lovingly to my cheek.

The shadows grow longer, and we reluctantly think of the dirty town, with its "best electric car system in the United States." The crickets are chirping outside our window and the frogs are croaking and the owls are hooting in the sycamores.

Mexican Joe brings around our horse and we start homeward in the mystic California twilight, which ere long deepens into an impenetrable blackness. The hobo regiments form a weird escort, as our impatient steed flies along. He is choosing a route for himself, quite new to us, for between us and the lights of the town our straining eyes discern the spooky outlines of a troop of oil derricks. We are among them now, and our unaccustomed ears are assailed with the uncanny groaning and screeching of the pumps.

The night is so black, the hoboes follow us so persistently, the spooky oil derricks with their sobbing, screaming pumps are so disturbing, that I realize at once the glorious possibilities of the situation and give way to helpless terror—sweet, delicious terror, which impels me to nestle close to my dear boy and find absolute release from fear in his strong, protecting arms, till my friends, the hoboes and, no less, my friends the spooks, are left far behind.

I realize, with a sigh, that we are in town, and that it is now time for my terror to subside. Besides, Max must watch carefully lest we are bumped by the ubiquitous street car.

"Tired, dear?" and Max's voice has in it a strain so tender, so possessive, that I am glad, glad! "So tired, but so happy," I murmur, in the rapture of his slow release, as he lifts me to the pavement.

Ah, the dear June day, so happily spent, so reluctantly surrendered! We gaze long in each other's eyes and read each other's thoughts: "How good God is to us!"

Automobile Topics

F. C. Hotaling, who has a fine auto, is at the Vendome with his chauffeur.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Talbot made the run to San Jose last Sunday in their automobile.

Two men have successfully made the trip across the continent in an automobile from this city to New York. News of their arrival in New York was received several days ago.

An automobile has at last been devised that meets all the purposes of the farmer. It is an agricultural motor car driven by a strong single cylinder engine of about twelve horse power. It will haul a double furrow plow twice as fast as four horses, and unlike the horses does not give out from fatigue at the end of five or six hours. It can be used for hauling heavy loads along the highway, or to drive a threshing machine, and is in fact a very complete combination of portable and traction engine.

The spectacle of our Fire Chief riding to fires in an automobile will soon be presented in the streets of this city. Though Chief Sullivan is an enthusiastic lover of horseflesh, he long ago declared that the auto was the coming vehicle for the officers of a fire department, and he finally prevailed on the Supervisors to order an electric buggy for him. It is now being built by the Electric Vehicle Company of Hartford, Connecticut.

Great interest is being taken in the run to be made to Del Monte by the Automobile Club on Thursday next. About one hundred and twenty-five automobiles will make the trip. They will spend Thursday night at the Vendome in San Jose. They will spend some time in Salinas Friday and reach Del Monte that evening. Saturday they will take the famous seventeen mile drive. On Monday morning the hill climbing contests will take place and in the afternoon the races will be pulled off. There will be representatives from Fresno, Stockton and San Jose. It will be the largest gathering of machines ever held west of Chicago. The beautiful prizes to be competed for were presented by C. S. Middleton, E. Courtney Ford, L. P. Low, Fred A. Jacobs, F. A. Hyde, the Del Monte hotel and the National, White and Pioneer Automobile companies.

The people of Los Angeles have been educated up to a proper recognition of the importance of the automobile and the rights of owners. The Supervisors recently adopted sensible and practicable rules for regulating the driving of automobiles on country roads. The idea of establishing a fixed maximum rate of speed was abandoned. Instead of making an arbitrary standard they merely declared that the speed shall at no time be greater than is reasonable and proper, with due regard to highway traffic and the safety of persons and property. It is practically impossible for an observer to determine the rate of speed at which an automobile is traveling, and the safety of the driver demands that he shall regulate his speed with reason. The rules provide that the driver of an automobile shall stop and remain stationary on signal by a person riding or driving, until the latter has passed.

Laws governing speed are now in force in almost every State in the Union. When the motor car was a new thing the amateur who drove his own car made the highest rate of speed possible. The motor vehicle was looked upon as a plaything and as such was abused to the limit. Now that the general utility of the vehicle has been demonstrated, the racing machine has been turned over to the professional racing men, and the pleasure and all-purpose machine has fallen into its proper place. That the motor vehicle is entitled to consideration on account of its general utility and growing popularity is an acknowledged fact in many States, and wherever people are enlightened on the subject concessions have been made to those engaged in promoting the industry. —The Chauffeur.

No Time Like the Present

The schools close in the beginning of June and open again in the latter part of July. As so many families go to the country merely for the benefit of their children, the result is that around the 4th of July holidays the resorts and summer boarding houses are taxed to their full limit to take care of the guests. During the week following many return, which continues till near the month's end. This relieves the holiday congestion and the many who could not be accommodated at that time can easily be taken care of from now on.

No time is better for an outing in Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino and Lake counties than July, August and September. The evenings are invariably pleasant. There the San Franciscan can sit out in the open air till late, a pleasure he never enjoys at home. The water in the rivers, streams and lakes is warm for bathing, and it is a time when the fish bite most readily. Besides, till the end of August is the open season for deer in Sonoma county and until the end of September in Mendocino county.

Those who could not be accommodated over the holidays, and those who can now get away from business, can easily find a location for their outing by consulting "Vacation 1903" issued by the California Northwestern Railway. Hotels, resorts, homes for summer boarders, and camping spots are all given in this book, together with the surroundings, terms, etc. To be procured at the company's offices or in answer to a mail request.

STAGE

The Manxman

The dramatized version of Hall Caine's story, "The Manx man," is a play well suited to the temperament of people who like to be thrilled by the heartaches of a weak woman. "The Manxman" is a painful play abounding in commonplace sentiment and commonplace people. Hall Caine has fashioned for us a familiar group of people and he has involved them in complications that are as old as the human family, but that always command the interest of those that like to behold the havoc played by Dan Cupid. The play is full of heart interest, and it invokes deep sympathy for the faithful Peter who worshiped the woman whose affections had been won by another, and who believed that she reciprocated his passion. The fidelity of Peter Quillian is akin to that of Sim's 'Ostler Joe. He never blames the woman who had wronged him, and he never permits aught to be said against her. He is the uncultured nobleman one meets so often on the stage but seldom in real life. Yet he is not a creature of the imagination. The Alcazar company presents the play with that level of excellence which is found in all their work. Indeed it is surprising how effectively this stock company enters upon a change of atmosphere, and imparts plausibility to everything it undertakes. Mr. White Whittlesey plays Peter Quillian without a trace of artificiality. In the earlier scenes he catches the humor of the role and skilfully prepares his audience for the tragic climax to his happy domesticity. The lights and shadows are splendidly contrasted. Bertha Creighton plays the part of Kate in a most convincing way. She never exaggerates, and she is never guilty of undue emphasis. Charles Wyngate is a trifle woodeny in the role of Philip. He never enters into the spirit of the role. The other members of the company are satisfactory.

The Villain in the Play

Henry Shumer is making a great record for himself as a stage villain. He has been doing all kinds of villain stunts since he joined the Central stock, and they shifted him over to the Alcazar when "Heartsease" was put on, to appear as a swagger villain in silk tights and with a sword. He's getting so used now to being groaned at by the gallery when the curtain call brings him out with the hero and heroine that he doesn't mind a bit. (In parenthesis let me say, Shumer is a real good chap off the stage.) In this week's Central play, he is the secondary villain, Dobre, who does all kinds of wicked things, spurred on by Nichols, a French officer, from wooing a man's wife away from him, stealing a necklace out of spite and fastening the crime on a poor, unoffending woman, to helping his accomplice in a murder or so. In the end he repents and it turns out that he was only a sort of cat's paw, so the gallery's groans turn to rousing cheers. Seriously speaking, the character work of Shuman as Gaspard Dobre is admirable, and his make-up in the last acts is very clever. "A Lion's Heart" is a melodrama of the old-fashioned kind, and it contains some bright dialogue and handsome scenery. Mayall wears the tights of a youthful lion-tamer in the prologue, but after that appears as a middle-aged man with gray hair and in regulation attire, which does not, however, conceal the "lion's heart." On Monday night he received two huge floral pieces and curtain calls without number. Miss Lawton doubled up as the erring wife and later her grown-up daughter, and managed to bring tears from the eyes of many in the audience. Miss Vane and Mr. Bacon have considerable comedy work to which they do full justice.

Abounding in Warmth

"Hearts Aflame," the second offering of the Neill-Morosco season at the California, is a splendid play for a cold winter night. It reminds one of Joaquin Miller's latest poem—it is warm, very warm. You think of the old game of hide-the-handkerchief as it progresses: plot, warm; dialogue, warmer; situations, very warm indeed. But then hearts aflame would naturally not be of arctic temperature. The company braces up well to the ordeal of this ardent drama. Miss Kemble as the neglected wife wins the audience's sympathies and Mr. Oberle gives a lifelike picture of the husband, a despicable cad. One of the best bits of character drawing is Miss Esmond's Alison Deyo. It is a part widely different from the blind girl in last week's play. Alison is a mannish, horsey girl, very outspoken but good-natured, and Miss Esmond makes the audience warm to the character at once. Phosa McAllister's Mrs. Leigh is worthy of mention, as is Frank MacVicars's Bryce. Scott Seaton does well with the butler's role. The part of Mrs. Dunbar (the late Mrs. Watts), which satirizes New York's on-with-the-new before the first matrimonial shackles are shed, is entrusted to last week's debutante, Miss Hartstone. Though rather young for the role, there are no signs of the amateur in her work, which is spirited and intelligent.

Bred in the Bone

Very few know how Adelaide Manola, who is to take the part of Heline in Harrigan's company this season, became an actress. She is the daughter of Marion Manola, whose own sad experience determined her that Adelaide should never become an actress. About six years ago Marion and "Jack" Mason were about to appear in a Chicago house in a vaudeville sketch they had prepared. Unfortunately, on the day of the performance Marion took suddenly ill. Within an hour afterwards, Adelaide "blew in" at the hotel where her mother was staying, fresh from convent, and heartily tired of convent life. Mason's eagle eye caught the marked resemblance to the mother, saw the lines of worry on her brow and gleam of ambition in her eye, and an idea struck him. At that evening's initial presentation of the vaudeville sketch, Adelaide played the mother's role, and played it so admirably that both star and sketch made a pronounced hit. That evening's emergency experiment settled convent life and the choice of a profession for Adelaide. She secured an engagement and has never quit since, only just long enough to get married and enjoy a brief honeymoon.

"As You Like It" will be given this and tomorrow afternoons and evenings at Sutro Heights as Shakespeare's comedy has never been presented before in San Francisco. Nance O'Neil, who leaves for New York shortly to make her Broadway debut, has been tendered a testimonial and will make her debut as Rosalind. Miss O'Neil will be accorded strong support and James J. Corbett will appear as Charles the wrestler. The grounds will be brilliantly illuminated at night and comfortable seats have been arranged for thousands. Reservations may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's.

Blanche Bates's Ambition

Blanche Bates has returned to New York, full of California ozone and fortified for her winter's work. She would not have returned when she did but went in response to a telegram from Mr. Belasco. Rehearsals are about to begin for next season, which means a hot August in New York for her. Blanche Bates has few of the airs of a star, still she thinks rather well of herself and with good reason. She has done well and recent arrivals from New York say that her "Darling of the Gods" was the most artistic presentation of last season, though by no means the biggest hit—that distinction belonging to Du Barry. In the role of the Japanese wife Miss Bates makes up until there is absolutely nothing left of her own face or figure and she has worn kimonos so much without corsets that her waist is hopelessly lost and she has been trying to find it again in California. She is frantic to go to London but she does not wish to go in a Japanese play as she does not think the English would understand or appreciate it as the Americans do, and she also wants to go to London in "white face," as she expresses it—that is, as Blanche Bates and not in a character as utterly foreign as the present one. She is dying to do a "Wild West" play with unbroken horses to ride and a Wild West heroine breaking into London drawing-rooms to play. Before her departure she entertained an ultra-bohemian gathering at the residence of Mrs. Forbes, where she had been stopping. Among the assemblage was Mrs. Varney Gaskill, whom Miss Bates met in Paris during the Exposition. The two are quite cronies.

Is Virginia Jealous?

Can it be that the green-eyed monster has touched Virginia Harned, in private life Mrs. E. H. Sothern? Or is the clever press agent of Sothern again in the field? Word comes from New York that Miss Harned may appear next season in a play written by her husband, the same play he had designed for Julia Marlowe. This sounds very much as if the fair Virginia, the original Trilby, may have objected to her husband's fashioning a play for another star and leaving her out in the cold, as it were. One can imagine her as having put her shapely foot—the beautiful Trilby foot—down and saying: "My dear hubby, if you are writing plays for anybody, I don't see why another woman should play the star role. I am not on the superannuated list myself, yet."

Elsie de Wolf has made a hit in London, if one may believe the despatches. Miss de Wolfe is the favorite society actress in New York, her social position never having suffered by her election of the stage as a career. She is invited to all the best houses. She lives in a charming little home in Irving Place, once the residence of Washington Irving, and her friend Elizabeth Marbury, the play-broker, lives with her.

Margaret and Charlotte are Not at Odds

Margaret Anglin and Charlotte Thompson are still friends, and those stories that wafted westward of their falling out turn out to be groundless. It is true that Miss Anglin accepted a play by Miss Thompson, but did not produce it, but that was not her fault. Miss Anglin is not an independent star, but is under contract to a manager who prefers to choose his own plays. But she is a great admirer of the young Californian woman's talent, and they kept house together when Miss Thompson first went to New York. Late despatches say that Miss Anglin while in London read and approved a play manuscript by "a young American woman," which she will produce during her San Francisco season. Friends of Miss Thompson believe she is the young American woman referred to.

Kendall Is Witty

Ezra Kendall has made a rule not to be interviewed, especially in a one-night stand, unless the interviewer has a written letter from the encouraging editor. He does not propose to lose his eyesight, he says, looking for interviews after talking to a reporter for three hours. When Kendall was a struggling star some years ago, he had a treasurer with his company who had the faculty of being short in his accounts. The comedian overlooked it for several weeks, as the accounts were small. They finally grew to such proportions that his services were dispensed with. On reaching Birmingham, Alabama, the local manager asked what had become of his former treasurer.

"I had to let him go. He was color blind," said Kendall.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, he couldn't tell my money from his."

The Author of "Honey, My Sweet"

Few people know that the man who wrote that pretty love song, "Honey, my Sweet," has been in town the last five weeks. His name is George Spink and he is in the company of Amelia Bingham. In "The Climbers" he played a small part, but he was John Strong, the reformer, in "The Modern Magdalen," and played a most disagreeable and improbable part as well as it could be played. Mr. Spink was much entertained by Bohemian Club men and sang his song for a select few. He is exceedingly modest and dislikes to have his connection with the catchy song so much as mentioned. Miss Helen Lackaye, Wilton Lackaye's pretty sister, who had a very small part in "The Climbers" and in "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson," is writing a book, and as Miss Bingham writes well and forcibly herself on many topics, dictating to her secretary, it was quite a literary company. Another member of Miss Bingham's company, Mrs. Wesley-Smith, her leading character woman, who plays the mother in "The Climbers" and does such a strong bit of work as Mrs. Jenkins in the "Magdalen," is the wife of a prominent New York physician and has the distinction of being the youngest member of Sorosis of New York—undoubtedly the most prominent woman's club in the country. She was entertained by Mrs. Dunbar, the president of San Francisco's Sorosis, and by several Sorosis women, though she happened here during the vacation of the clubs.

Has McIvor-Tyndall Made a Discovery?

A gentleman who has spent many years in the study of material science attended Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lecture last Sunday evening. He listened most attentively to the psychic's theories and afterward remarked: "I believe that Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has made a wonderful discovery." The subject of the lecture was "The Thought That Kills," and somewhat startling as it may sound to the layman the psychologist proceeded to treat the subject from a literal point of view. There was a large audience, whether attracted by the lecture or by the experiments in subconscious phenomena, it is impossible to say. Certainly it was a superior audience, in point of education and social prominence. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall assumes that each human organism is a complete electrical instrument, and that Thought is in itself merely force, capable of direction according to the will or desire. Thus the character of the thoughts sent out determines the chemical affinity of the magnet aura each person surrounds himself with. By creating only destructive thoughts we make ourselves a magnet to attract destructive thoughts, which in time disintegrate the physical atoms. The next lecture in the series will be on "Telepathy: Is It a Lost Faculty or a Development?" On Sunday evening, August ninth, Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will take for his subject: "The Power of Persuasion." Each lecture will be followed by demonstrations of the power of thought as a force.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The Kaufman troupe of acrobats who created such a sensation on their first appearance here two years ago will return to the Orpheum after a tour of the world. They give a display of combination trick riding, with a climax in which the six performers pyramid themselves on a single wheel. Larry Dooley and James Tenbrooke, singing and talking comedians, will contribute fifteen minutes of fun and song. Roberts, Hayes and Roberts, singing and dancing sketch trio, direct from New York, will appear here for the first time in a sketch entitled "The Infant." Madame Konorah, the "mystic calculator," will appear for her last week, as will also James J. Morton, the monologuist.

"The Vinegar Buyer," in which Ezra Kendall opens his Columbia engagement, is by Herbert Hall Winslow and the comedy is woven about such a character as James Whitcomb Riley's rural friend, Joe Miller. There will be Saturday matinees during the Kendall season. Lottie Alter, the favorite soubrette, is with Kendall.

"Janice Meredith" was given by Mary Mannering at the Columbia but the Neill-Morosco company will produce it for the first time at popular prices at the California. The story of the play is a sprightly one and Miss Kemble will have a chance to let us see what she can do in a new line of work as the heroine. "A Royal Family" comes next.

That pretty play "The Butterflies" by Henry Guy Carleton, will follow "The Manxman" at the Alcazar. White Whittlesey will be at the theatre but two more weeks. His final week he will appear in "The Three Musketeers."

"The Highwayman" is a distinct success and will be continued at the Tivoli.

Big crowds still attend Fischer's and there will be another fortnight of "Under the Red Globe" and "The Three Musketeers."

"In Wall Street" will have a third and last week at the Grand. On August ninth "In Harvard" will be put on, the latest Rogers Brothers success. The company will be increased by five new principals.

Edwin Arden's great Russian drama, "Zorah," will be the Central's bill. It has a strong plot and Mayall will have the principal role of the Rabbi Frances. The scenery will be a feature.

At the Chutes will be Lester and Curtin, the "man-o'warsmen," in a comedy acrobatic act; Hathaway and Walton, refined singing and dancing duo; Little Blossom, whom Ashton Stevens interviewed in last Sunday's Examiner; and Hank Whitcomb, who imitates birds and animals. The three Kuhns and Zano will vary their turns.

Eleanor Jenkins, the new comedienne at Fischer's, will make her first appearance in the double bill of "The Big Little Princess" and "Quo Vass Is." The former is after Mrs. Burton Harrison's last excellent play, "The Little Princess." There is a lion coming all the way from New York to act in "Quo Vass Iss" that is said by the management to have cost one thousand dollars. "Arizona" will be the burlesque to follow. —The Playgoer.

Woman's Way

NEW YORK, JULY 27.—A daily paper is soon to be established in this city by several women. It will be conducted by women in all its departments.—Press Despatch.

Scene, City desk of the Woman's Daily Morning Orb. Miss Clever, the City Editor, flanked by several reporters, special writers and a stenographer. All talk at once.

Miss Clever (rapping on desk): I can't understand a word you say. For heaven's sake, do speak one at a time. Mrs. Brilliant, what is your kick?

Mrs. B. (throwing paper on desk): I think it's a mean shame. Miss Penandink, the night copy reader, cut me down to a quarter of a column on my description of the Smartems' tea. I wrote two solid columns about it, and Mrs. Smartem was delighted when I read her the description. Now she'll cut me dead when she meets me.

Miss C.: Oh, we can't give the paper up to that old climber. What's your trouble, Miss Epigram?

Miss E. (weeping bitterly): Three words were spelled wrong in my critique, and they spoke of the star having "nerve" when I wrote "verve."

Miss C. (laughing): Oh, that's a common happening. I'll wager everybody's joshing the star about his colossal nerve today. Don't worry, dear. We'll invite him to a little dinner at Sherry's and open a few bots. in his honor. Miss Leader, why that frown?

Miss L. (waving several sheets of copy): I shall resign if that saucy little brat of a Poetaster gets her stuff ahead of mine again. Here is my brilliant editorial on Race Suicide crowded out again. I went in the composing rooms and took it away myself. It was getting all soiled and nasty-looking.

Miss C.: Oh, now, you know I have nothing to do with the editorial pages. Go and carry your kick to the Managing Editor, Mrs. Grasse.

Miss L.: But she is at the dressmaker's and she is going out to dinner and left word for you to run her job today.

Miss C. (her glasses dropping off nervously): She did, did she? I wonder whom she's dining with?

Miss Gossip (the society reporter): I know. It's Millions, who's backing our paper.

Miss C. (rising and putting on her jacket): Excuse me, girls, I can't stop now. Here, Gossip, you can run the shop awhile. I'll 'phone if I don't come back inside of two hours. Be careful and don't let any libels creep in the paper. (Hurries away.)

Mrs. Brilliant: That's a nice little story. Why, Clever told me yesterday she and Millions were only waiting for his wife to get her divorce to announce their own engagement.

Miss Gossip: Wish I were there to see the climax.

Miss Epigram: Oh, I back Clever to win out. She's got the best lingo and the best staying powers.

Miss Leader: But Mrs. Grasse leads on clothes and shape.

(Copy boy appears and looks around for City Editor.)

Miss Gossip: Get to your work, girls. Don't you see the boy's waiting for copy? Miss Epigram, would you mind going down town and matching me a bit of broadcloth? Take Miss Leader with you, and charge the cab to the paper. —The Stenographer.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

A Boom in Symphony Concerts

There's to be competition, it seems, in the symphony field this winter. The Woman's Council announces a series of symphony concerts with Giuseppe Campanari as leader, and the San Francisco Symphony Society will give concerts with Fritz Scheel as leader. In the fall will come Pietro Mascagni to lead some concerts at Stanford University and in this city, and there is a possibility of Mr. Friedlander's repeating his experiment of the spring at Fischer's, with W. Zech, Jr. as leader of a symphony orchestra. With all this in view, it is quite certain that we are to have a symphony season. And with rival leaders, we are sure to have some novelties. In past seasons, the orchestras were not permitted to try out many new compositions. The symphonies rendered were as a rule those with which audiences were familiar, and the suites such as we had heard many times. With Scheel handling the baton we are sure to have Beethoven and Wagner finely interpreted. No one can excel Scheel in the reading of Beethoven, though there are many who will match Mascagni against the Vienna man when it comes to getting the soul out of Wagner.

A Famous Band

The Marine Band of Washington, D. C., celebrated its one hundred and fifth anniversary recently. The band was organized under an act passed by Congress and signed by President John Adams. The bandsmen then were enlisted soldiers armed with drums and fifes. One of the compositions made famous by the band was "The Mocking Bird" arranged and dedicated to Harriet Lane, then mistress of the White House. John L. Glubb was the first real leader of the band and after him came Eutine Triquet, Francis Schenig, Joseph Curveiller, Antonio Pons and Francis Scala. The last came from Italy with a requisition of thirteen musicians, recruits for the organization. It was Scala who instituted the open-air concerts that became so popular. After him came Henry Fries, then Louis Schneider, and then the only John Philip Sousa. Franchiulli succeeded Sousa and the present leader is William E. Santelmann.

I remember the little Joran sisters very well. They used to appear at lodge entertainments and at the Western Addition Club. They were pretty little girls, and wore their hair in long Marguerite braids. After they went abroad two of them made names almost at once for themselves in the music world. It was Pauline's husband who was killed the other day by falling from a train on his way to Scotland with his family. He was the Baron d'Bush.

Success at Last

It must be about ten years since Emil Bruguiere started out as a composer. His first work was the "Lucille" waltzes, if I recollect aright, written when he was a mere boy. Some time after he wrote his opera, "Count Fiddlesticks," with the late Dan O'Connell as librettist, but failed to place the work with a manager. Not discouraged, young Bruguiere kept on composing. He wrote the music for Francis Powers's second play, but the play was a failure and its incidental music shared in the consequent oblivion. Then a little success crowned the ambitious Californian boy's efforts—Katherine Fisk, the contralto, put some of his songs on her program and as they were charming songs they became popular among singers in many cities. Now the biggest success yet gained has come to young Bruguiere. The Bostonians will produce his opera "Kasiki." It will be tried out in the East but we may possibly see it next spring. The Bostonians look kindly upon Californian writers. They had one of Clay Greene's operas, "The Maid of Plymouth," and it was in San Francisco that they tried and accepted Giacomo Minkowski's "Smugglers of Badayez."

In England it is a custom in the large cities to have organ recitals in the middle of the day, of about an hour's duration and with a nominal rate of admission. English people of the laboring classes are much more partial to organ music than are Americans.

The Index Expurgatorius

The announcement that Gabriel d'Annunzio's "Laus Vitæ" has been placed on the index expurgatorius reminds us that a few years ago, when some officious folk solicited the Pope to ban the works of this author, His Holiness refused on the ground that d'Annunzio was the only modern author who could write Italian. The index expurgatorius has none of the terrors now that it had in earlier centuries. For that matter, there are revisions from time to time, and books once condemned are removed, either because they are no longer considered dangerous, or because of a more liberal spirit in the later times. Judging by the storms evoked every now and then over the institution, one might be led to believe that the devout Catholic is left little if anything on which to feed his mental needs. On the contrary, the index is very much the same as the ordinary precautions taken by careful people in regard to the books admitted to their households. We all have our private index, books that we find unwholesome or unprofitable for ourselves, but which others may enjoy, and like the church index, we revise from time to time, and add or subtract from the contents. But the Papal endorsement of d'Annunzio's Italian cannot be stretched to cover the English translations.

Fawcett's Vulgarians

"The Vulgarians" whom Edgar Fawcett writes about belong to the same class as the Bines, whom Harry Leon Wilson introduced us to in "The Spenders." The Troops were rich. They had more money than they knew what to do with, and when the favorable termination of a lawsuit brought them not only prosperous mines but the accumulations of the years of litigation, they were simply appalled. The family consisted of the mother and three grown children, a son and two daughters, none of whom had had, up to that time, any sense of their importance. They differed from their neighbors in the little Western town only in living in the biggest house and having more money to spend. They were uncultured, but sincere and unworldly. The children immediately decided to go East and enjoy themselves, but the mother decided to remain behind. Thereafter the story deals with the younger generation. They were altogether unsophisticated, and when they reached Chicago, where they stopped over, they treated the mob of interviewers and yellow journalists, the philanthropic beggars and the rest of the horde of nuisances precisely as they would their fellow townsmen, and their simplicity and sincerity were taken advantage of in a way that any but such unsophisticated innocents would have expected. It was there that they gained their first idea of the importance of money, and here that Leander manifested his first symptoms of "big head." In New York they had the good fortune to fall into the hands of a young widow, Marian Warrender, who was on the verge of a break with her stepbrother and only relative, because she was not willing to marry a titled English fortune-hunter. Mrs. Warrender made arrangements with the Troops whereby she secured a comfortable living for herself and at the same time undertook the social education of the family, saved them from the thousand and one mistakes which they would have otherwise perpetrated daily and kept the heiresses out of the hands of the fortune-hunters, and played the good fairy generally, with the result that the parvenus suffered less than most of their class under like conditions. One cannot help thinking that Mr. Fawcett has rather overdone it in some respects, as when he tells us that the girls are uncertain in the use of knives and forks. Though they are unquestionably raw our sympathies are with them, rather than with the highly-polished artificialities with whom they come into contrast. Morally, at least, they were wholesome, and when Lola is bestowed upon Gregory Renshawe, we cannot repress the feeling that he has decidedly the best of the bargain. This story appeared as the principal tale in the Smart Set early last year, and is now brought out in book form by the Ess Ess publishing company.

In "Exits and Entrances" Charles Warren Stoddard tells this story of the way in which Mark Twain and Charles Dudley Warner collaborated in the production of their novel, "The Gilded Age": "Mark and Charles Dudley Warner were walking to church one Sunday in Hartford. Said Warner: 'Let's write a novel!' Mark wondered what in the world there was to write about, but promised to think the matter over, and proceeded to do so. On the way home it was decided that Mark should begin and write till he got tired, and then there should be a gathering of the wives and Joe Twitchell—the clerical chum—for the reading of the same. He wrote a dozen chapters and read them to the domestic critics. 'Do you catch the idea?' said Mark to Warner. The latter thought he did, and took up the thread where Mark dropped it, and spun on until he felt fagged. The story was passed from hand to hand like a shuttle, and came at last to a conclusion. Whenever it flagged under one roof it was carried over to another, where it took a fresh start. The changes were frequent, a chapter or two bringing the writer to a halt; or in consequence of the business of the book falling naturally to one hand or to the other—the love-making to Warner and the melodrama to Mark. As to the plot of the story, it was never meant to have any; on the contrary, the story told itself. The quotations at the head of the chapters were furnished by a marvel of linguistic lore, a resident of Hartford; and each quotation is genuine and applicable, and no two are in the same tongue."

Some Whistler Anecdotes

Once when employing a new model Whistler asked:

"Have you sat for any one lately?"

"Oh, yes," she replied, "Mr. Leighton, Mr. Poynter, Mr. Burne-Jones, Mr. Rossetti—"

"Heaven, what a lot!" broke in Whistler, leaving it ambiguous whether he meant quantity or quality.

"Do you see that bit there?" he asked one day of a visitor to his studio, indicating with an admiring gesture a spot on the canvas he had just been painting. "That, sir—that—by Jove, the man who could do that could do anything." It recalls the anecdote of Thackeray who, when he had written the sentence in "Vanity Fair," "She admired her husband standing there, strong, brave, victorious," struck his fist upon the table and exclaimed, "By God, that's a stroke of genius!"

An arrangement for some sight-seeing excursion had been made between Whistler and some of his friends one day, with the studio as a point of departure. When the party had foregathered, Whistler remarked that is was a fine day for the expedition, and immediately set to work to paint the portrait of one of the party—a lady. An hour or two went by, and nothing more was said of the outing, until finally one of the gentlemen expressed his dissatisfaction at the change of program, whereupon Whistler apologized for his forgetfulness, but added a drop of honey by remarking: "Indeed, it is not every man in England that I would paint a picture before."

On one occasion a fulsome young lady, seated next to him at a dinner, remarked:

"Isn't it nice that such a universal artist as Mr. Leighton should be the new president? He is something of an architect, you know, and his sculpture is something wonderful, isn't it?".

"Yes," returned Whistler, "and he paints, too."

A commissioner representing the American section of one of the Paris expositions, wishing to be brief and business-like, wrote to a number of American artists resident in Paris, making appointments for them to call on him at his hotel, at certain definite hours. Among them was Whistler, with the time set for "4:30, precisely." The note he received in reply was characteristic of the author of "The Gentle Art of Making Enemies":

"Dear Sir: I have received your letter announcing that you will arrive in Paris on the ——th. I congratulate you. I have never been able, and I never shall be able to be anywhere at '4:30, precisely.' Yours most faithfully, J. McN. Whistler." —The Artist.

The Primary Election

The long expected contest for control of the Democratic machine will take place next Tuesday. It will doubtless be a spirited affair for there is keen rivalry and some factional bitterness. In recent years the local Democratic organization has been an air-tight institution, remarkable for its exclusiveness, and the rank and file of the party were deprived of the glorious privilege of battling for supremacy. Such was the masterly domination of Mr. James D. Phelan and his satellite McNab, that no person who was unwilling to take orders from them in all matters pertaining to the government of the organization would be permitted to raise his voice in the councils of the party. They were intolerant of the spirit of independence, and those who were inclined to demur were denounced as rogues and knaves and driven out of the party. And such was the prestige of Phelan in those days, and so implicit was the confidence reposed by many decent but misguided people in the purity of McNab's motives, that when either of the bosses uttered a decree of excommunication the victim found it useless to seek vindication. From that time he became a political outcast. Once or twice the independents threatened to rebel and capture the organization, but with masterly adroitness the bosses nipped the opposition plans in the bud. The first time they autocratically denied the people the right to elect a municipal convention. They boldly resolved the county committee into a convention and proceeded to formulate a ticket. That was the most impudent exhibition of arbitrary practical politics ever given in this city, but the immaculate Phelan and the chaste McNab were the little tin gods before whom the people bowed in those days, and the high-handed proceeding met with the acquiescence of the public. Two years later the bosses of the air-tight organization sought to cajole the disaffected element in the party by vouchsafing them the privilege of voting at a primary, but when they saw that there was organized opposition they made a hippodrome out of the election, permitting nobody to vote of whose fealty they were not assured. But times have changed; there has been a reaction in public sentiment, and a law has been enacted which precludes a hippodrome primary. On Tuesday next every citizen who desires to exercise the elective franchise will be permitted to do so.

The McNab-Phelan Combine

Phelan and McNab have joined forces for Tuesday's contest, and they are singing the same old "good government" slogan, but they are likely to find that it is not so easy to impose on public credulity again. Mr. James D. Phelan is not sincere when he proclaims himself an exponent of civic integrity. His interest in politics is purely selfish. He is not actuated by high ideals, he is not moved by patriotic impulses, and he is not a stickler for the great primordial principles of government to which he affects devotion. His high ambition is a worthy one, and at one time the people, believing him to be devoted to their interests, were ready to assist him in its achievement, but no sooner was their confidence won than he betrayed them. Rich beyond the lures of Mammon, he established a record for honesty, and then this incorruptible reformer proceeded to fortify himself politically by making discreditable deals, and repudiating the Charter which he had fathered ostensibly in the interest of pure government. Some months ago, when Town Talk charged Mr. Phelan with having violated the civil service provisions of the charter, he hastened to make denial and requested retraction. He was invited to correct, over his own signature, whatever incorrect statements had been made, and though his agent declared he would do so Mr. Phelan was never again heard from on the subject. We do not believe we did Mr. Phelan an injustice, and we are quite certain that the hollowness of his pretensions is pretty well understood in this community. It is also quite certain that there is widespread dissatisfaction with the boss rule of the thrifty McNab, who has grown rich off fees which he received as an attorney but which were paid to invoke his political pull with public officials rather than for his legal ability. Opposed to the Phelan-McNab faction is the Democratic League, which was organized to wrest control of the party machinery from the Phelans, the McNabs, the Poppers, the Braunharts and the rest of the hypocritical reformers who have so long held sway. This organization started off with the support of the Examiner, but the backing of that paper was withdrawn when it was suggested to Mr. Hearst that as he was a candidate for President and hoped for a united delegation from California to the next National convention, he should keep aloof from factional strife. Moreover it was argued that he should seek to conciliate those whom he had estranged by the opposition of his paper in the campaigns of the past. This he decided to do, and since then the Examiner has refrained from "taking sides." Meanwhile the Democratic League has been perfecting organization in all the districts of the city, and so strong is the sentiment against Phelan-McNab rule that the opposition has been growing more powerful every day. The ambitious millionaire and his thrifty tout have been seeking to cloud the issue by advertising their servile tools as the only genuine blown-in-the-bottle, good government delegates, and warning voters against turning the city over to a band of political looters, but they are not likely to win by the circulation of the old familiar misrepresentations. The leaders of the reorganization movement are reputable citizens, and sincere Democrats who are interested in the welfare of the party and of the city. There is not a McNab, a Phelan or a Braunhart among them.

Labor Union Strife

The signs of the times portend the early dissolution of the Labor trust in this city. The labor leaders are snarling at one another with unprecedented ferocity, public sympathy is gradually being alienated by reason of the persistency with which industrial troubles are promoted and the injustice of the demands of certain unions, and political turmoil threatens to hasten the disintegration of the giant labor combination that has long exercised a powerful influence in local commercial circles. A general and fatal discord is spreading through the unions as a consequence of the political aims of certain leaders. The unions were warned against plunging into politics but they were lured in by men in whom they reposed confidence, and now they find that they are involved in serious strife. The Union Labor party is split wide open, with Mayor Schmitz leading one faction and Michael Casey the other. The erratic Livernash is in the forefront of the battle, having allied himself with Casey, and he is being denounced on all sides as a traitor to the union cause. Pin Head McCarthy, the Michael Feeney of trades-unionism, has had a row with Andrew Furuseth, the leader of the Water Front Federation, and on all sides there is crimination and recrimination. Meanwhile the linemen and the telephone company are getting farther apart than ever, and there has been talk of a sympathetic strike which, if ordered, would cause distress and suffering all over the city. It is evident that the unions have lost considerable prestige, and that the time is fast approaching when no candidate for office will care to appeal for votes on the ground that he has been devoted to the interests of the organized workingmen. The demagogue may soon find himself as unpopular as he was in the days that followed the popular uprising against the old sand-lot gang.

That Sloss Decision

Because Judge Sloss granted an injunction, some months ago, restraining the members of the Board of Health appointed by Mayor Schmitz from taking possession of the office, the impression is general that the Mayor has no authority under the charter to remove an appointed municipal officer. As no appeal was taken from the decision of Judge Sloss the law regulating the matter is somewhat uncertain, but many able lawyers are of the opinion that if Mr. Schmitz had the backbone to assert his authority he could exact better public service from the commission that is now engaged in wasting public funds. The decision of Judge Sloss in the Board of Health case is in the nature of a legal paradox, and it should be brought to the attention of the higher tribunal. It was contended by the attorney for the Mayor that the court had no right to determine the title to an office except upon a writ of quo warranto, and Judge Sloss agreed with him, but he granted the writ of injunction. The effect of this decision was to keep the men appointed by Mayor Schmitz out of the office. So the court, while admitting that he could not determine the title to the office in injunction proceeding, determined it nevertheless. And yet Judge Sloss does not pose as a humorist. He is a serious jurist and is regarded as a sound lawyer. But he must have enjoyed his little joke at the expense of Mayor Schmitz.

When Miles Goes Out

Lieutenant General Miles will be retired on August fifteenth, and thereafter there will be no commanding general of the army. The position of Chief of Staff will be substituted for the one so long occupied by General Miles and it will be filled by Major-General Samuel B. M. Young. This change will be brought about by a law passed in the last session of Congress. It was the result of a determined fight on the part of Secretary Root to bring the army organization to the efficiency that experience in the recent Spanish war showed was necessary. The title of commanding general of the army has been a misnomer in times of peace and unless the officer holding that position made himself a chief of staff of the army under the Secretary of War and the President he was a useless appendage. Lieutenant General Miles has hardly ever enjoyed the confidence of the Administration, for he was regarded as a political schemer, and hence he never wielded any influence. He was never permitted to conduct the operations of the army and under President McKinley he was merely tolerated. The Chief of Staff is to act in an advisory capacity to the President and Secretary of War, representing them and executing their commands. The general staff is required by the new law to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the military forces in time of war, and to investigate and report on all questions affecting the efficiency of the army and its state of preparation for military operations. When General Young becomes chief of staff he will be vested with greater authority than any preceding commanding general of the army ever exercised in time of peace.

Roosevelt's Fortunate Pet

When Major-General Young succeeds Lieutenant-General Miles, Brigadier General Leonard Wood, familiarly known as the President's pet, will be appointed a major-general. The phenomenal rise of this young man has occasioned much bickering throughout the army, and a great deal of unpleasant comment all over the country, because of the injustice which his promotion causes many officers to suffer. At the outbreak of the Spanish-American war Wood was an assistant surgeon in the regular army with the rank of captain. Although he served in that brief conflict as colonel, brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers, he remained a captain and assistant surgeon in the regular army until February, 1901, when he was appointed a brigadier-general in the line. And now, in little more than two years and six months from the date he ceased to be an assistant-surgeon, he is to attain the second highest rank possible to a man in the military service of the United States. Every man above him now is his senior in years and experience. Every man of general rank below him, with one exception, is older. He has more than twenty-one years to serve before reaching the retiring age. Of those who are his seniors, the youngest, Major-General Arthur MacArthur, will be retired in seven years. When Major-General Chaffee becomes lieutenant-general next January, MacArthur will be the senior major-general, and it is regarded as probable that he will succeed Chaffee as lieutenant-general. In that event Wood will become the senior major-general in less than three years, and should the precedent heretofore followed be adhered to he will attain the highest rank possible four months before his forty-ninth birthday. To become a brigadier-general Wood was jumped over four hundred and ninety-four of his seniors. With one exception every colonel, nearly every lieutenant-colonel, many of the majors and some of the captains over whom Wood was advanced saw actual service in the Civil War. General Wood entered the army in 1886 and about all that he ever did to distinguish himself was when he was an assistant medical officer on General Lawton's staff in the campaign against Geronimo. He won a medal of honor for distinguished service. At the outbreak of the Spanish war he was on duty in Washington as attending physician to the President and Mrs. McKinley. President Roosevelt, then Assistant Secretary of the Navy. was his most intimate friend. They walked, ran, rode and fenced together. General Alger offered the colonelcy of the three volunteer regiments of cavalry subsequently known as the Rough Rider regiments to Roosevelt, who having had no military experience declined the place and secured the appointment for his friend, Dr. Wood, and himself took the subordinate billet of lieutenant-colonelcy. This was the beginning of the rise of Leonard Wood from the vocation of medical man to the position of commander of armies. General Wood saw but one real battle in all his life, yet of the nearly five hundred men over whom he was advanced, two hundred and fifty-four were serving their country before he was five years of age, all had their baptism of fire, and the exploits of many of them would fill volumes. If Wood had graduated from West Point he would in the ordinary course of promotion now be a major. Only three officers in the entire army who are younger than Wood are of higher rank than major. The case of General Wood warrants the assumption that young men waste their time when they go to West Point. Instead of acquiring a knowledge of the soldier's duties at that institution the ambitious young military man should study medicine and the ways of the politician.

Emily's Conquest

The most notable conquest of the infidel that has been made for a long time was achieved by Emily Brown of Appleton, Wis. She is the daughter of a missionary who has been soul-saving in Korea. She is not related to the well known Nancy Brown who knew a thing or two, but she is just as quick as that clever damsel to detect a "good thing" when it comes her way. Nancy Brown of Appleton is now Empress of Korea. She is as high up in the social scale as the Chicago girl who married the Viceroy of India, but she didn't use her father's money to assist her in climbing. She is a self-made Empress. She used to sing in the mission church near Emperor Yi Honze's palace and he heard her sweet voice and felt a thrill. He sought her out and invited her to join his harem, but she, modest girl from Wisconsin that she was, and becomingly virtuous as the daughter of a missionary should be, resented the insult. But, "about two years later," so the story goes—and no doubt the story was carefully edited by the missionary society—"she concluded to accept the Emperor's protection and went to live in the palace after securing from the Emperor a solemn promise of marriage when the affairs of state would permit." And "affairs of state" did permit, but during the two years Emily was "the favorite and confidante of the Emperor." And now this enterprising missionary lady will no doubt proceed to spread the light of true faith throughout the imperial dominions. Perhaps, by accepting a nook in an Emperor's harem, this pious girl from Wisconsin, with the sweet voice, will undertake the conversion of the whole empire. Her marriage will no doubt be regarded by the missionary society as a master stroke of Christian diplomacy, especially if the gospel follows the matrimonial flag.

Ella's Latest Lament

Ella Wheeler Wilcox is at it again. This time her lament is because children are not taught to breathe according to Wilcoxian rules, and she says that when any attempt to influence the school methods is essayed one might as well shoot away at a stone wall with an airgun. Now, if Ella were familiar with the management of public schools she would know that they are the breeding stations for the bacilli of every possible fad and fancy. It only needs a plausible talker with a little political pull or backing, and the thing is done. One fad after another finds place until the essentials are jettisoned. Some "Pro Bono Publico," "Constant Reader," "Old Subscriber" or "Vox Populi" has only to discover that one mother on his block is neglecting to have her brood black their shoes or brush their teeth, and straightway the matter is removed from the home to the school and from parental to pedagogical supervision. It makes no difference that it may be an isolated case of indifference or ignorance. Seize the pen and write to the papers, and straightway there is a cult formed to force the introduction of boot-blacking or tooth-brushing into the public school curriculum. No matter how slight or insignificant the matter may be in itself, let one faddist discover that mothers do not or cannot or will not attend to it, and then teachers must. What parents do not do in the home for their own two or three, teachers are obliged to attend to at school for fifty or more. The natural result is that parents, finding their work taken out of their hands, are quite satisfied to escape the responsibility for it. One of the latest fads is to provide the projected new school houses with bathing facilities, and of course the natural sequence will be that the teachers will superintend the bathing of their pupils. In New York there is a corps of trained nurses hired by the municipality to go around and tie up cut fingers and apply dabs of vaseline to skinned knees and elbows. Some one discovered that the mothers in the tenement districts did not see immediate death lurking behind every pin-scratch, and "something had to be done about it." Another of Ella's vagaries is the necessity for a little chat about the pathos of dumb animals, who cannot tell when they are hungry or in pain, and of their craving for affection and their appreciation of kindness, and of our responsibility toward them. And there again she shows her ignorance of what she is preaching about, for life has been made positively burdensome to unlucky pedagogues, by the "nature study" fad. People like Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Charlotte Perkins Stetson, who have nothing in the wide world to do but attend to other people's business and hunt up odd jobs for over-worked teachers and mothers, are much to be envied, but a single day in charge of half a dozen lively youngsters at home, or of a class in one of the primary schools, would open their eyes a bit to what is going on and being done in the world without their fostering care and guiding hands. It is lucky for the Wilcoxes and Stetsons that they are paid for putting their impracticable theories on paper and not for carrying them out.

The Desire for Distinction

BY HARRY COWELL

Man has ever delighted to regard himself as the darling of Nature, the pet of a Special Providence, the raison d'etre of the immeasurable universe. His vanity extends beyond the solar system. Not yet has any power given him the gift of seeing himself as Science sees him. In these Darwinian days even, the co-discoverer of Evolution, undergoing reversion in his old age, attempts to revive the self-love-born belief that this little earth, alone inhabited of all the stars that besprinkle infinite space, is the centre of things created, and exists for the sake of little man, who exists for his own soul's sake. To make all things—whether designed for that purpose or not—subserve the ends of the soul, is no mean ideal.

It was amour propre, not reason, that so bitterly opposed the theories of the modest author of "The Descent of Man"; that so long prevented the great new-rich animal from owning his poor relations.

To be told that flowers are fair for their own sweet sake; that the songs of the birds and their painted plumage have an end far other than the delighting of him, is still displeasing to the featherless biped in comparison with whom the peacock is modesty itself.

Few things please a man more than to have an exception made in his favor. The interested flattery of a parasite finds a more willing ear than the disinterested frankness of a friend. Agree readily with a man in his own modest estimate of himself, and note the result.

The fewer "the few" are, the keener the competition to become one of them. Four hundred is a fashionable number. Titles, decorations, distinctions of all kinds, are desired in proportion to their rarity. Where courts are common, a nobleman is nobody. Much of the love for precious stones, rare books, and the like, is due to the fact that by owning something unique or uncommon one becomes to a certain extent distinguished.

The end of "Fashion" is not beauty, neither is it the charm of variety; it is distinctiveness in dress, etc. No matter how exquisite a thing may be, if it be within the reach of everybody, he who considers himself "somebody" will have none of it. Hence, in some measure, the "unappreciated sky."

I have known critics admire a poem, a painting, a sonata, or what not, for no other reason, as I have every reason to believe, than the desire to be alone in an appreciation. One finds fastidious lovers of literature reading the unread author and dropping him if haply he become popular.

Many characteristic minor faults of the fine, the tasteful, may be traced to a fear of being classified with cheap people.

The vulgar do undesirable things in order to attract attention; the refined refrain from doing desirable things that may possibly attract attention.

Not infrequently a man of marked individuality will affect to be as other men, lest, being natural, he be accused of affectation.

At bottom, it is the desire for distinction that is here operative.

By being possessed of a little virtue one might very readily nowadays attain real distinction; but the way is so obvious, so easy, that no one dreams of trying it.

In fact the desire is to appear, rather than to be, distinguished.

When a classical education was one of the marks of a "gentleman," no end of unphilosophical young fellows were wont to study Plato in order to know Greek, or rather to have it known that they knew Greek. It never entered their heads to study Greek in order to know Plato; to question life in company with Socrates.

One such I well remember, an exemplary youth with a talented tongue, on speaking terms with no less than twelve languages—accounted a genius. Now, the fellow was a fool. He had at his tongue's end merely a dozen different varieties of talking nonsense. In reality, he would have been very much more distinguished had he been able to speak a word of sense in the vernacular; had he been possessed of sufficient ideas to furnish one for each month of the year.

Every reader can no doubt call to mind prosperous mediocres who "do" Europe at enormous expense, and return home, having passed through the refining influence of Beauty as Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego passed through the fiery furnace, without leaving so much as a whiff of it upon their garments. For being the principals of so great a miracle, they deserve to be as distingues as they desire.

There is a very numerous class of humans, with almost nothing to differentiate them from the rest of animals, who, impervious to ideas, resent most the alleged insult, bewail most the alleged loss of dignity, when a Huxley, for instance, looking the facts in the face, assigns to man a place in nature in unflattering juxtaposition to the anthropoid apes. To hear them abuse the scientist, one would think that he was responsible for the facts.

Now, in spite of physical homologues, spiritually, an ape and a man may be very far apart. Apes are not characterized by any great moral, intellectual, or æsthetic development.

The way of escape from the "insult" is quite clear. The farther along the road of the good, the true, and the beautiful a man goes, the greater the gap between him and his nearest living poor relation. Those who emphasize the marks of a man, his differentia, are distinguished.

Oakland's Pet Aversion

It would be an exceedingly dull week in Oakland were William J. Dingee to escape execration for seven consecutive days. The average Oaklander regards Mr. Dingee as the incarnation of capitalistic greed, and he never takes a drink of water without uttering anathema against the man who fixes the price of that beverage. And as Oakland is quite a temperate town thirst-quenching is responsible for much picturesque language within its somnolent precincts. The name of Dingee has so often figured in angry debate in Oakland that it is gradually being colloquialized into a word of ominous significance; small boys use it when applying harsh terms to one another, while mothers whisper it to their recalcitrant offspring for the purpose of intimidation. Politicians accuse their opponents of being "Dingee men" in the hope of defeating them, and whenever a councilman espouses an unpopular measure he is suspected of intrigue with Dingee. So it may be inferred that William J. Dingee is a man of considerable importance in Oakland. He undoubtedly is. And incidentally it should be stated, in justice to both sides, that Oakland's aversion for Dingee is not more cordial than Dingee's contempt for Oakland. His dislike for the town is so great that he never visits it except when he has no alternative.

The Rise of Dingee

Notwithstanding the strained relations existing between Oakland and Mr. Dingee, the latter condescends to reap a harvest of dividends every little while from the other side. Moreover it was in Oakland that he laid the foundation of his fortune which, by the way, is considerable. Mr. Dingee is one of California's most conspicuous Captains of Industry, and he acquired his wealth by the exercise of his own talents, and all within the last fifteen years. The story of his rise from an humble clerkship in a real estate office to the affluence which he now enjoys is of rare interest, especially at this time, since he is once again in the public eye because of recent happenings in Oakland's city council. He belongs to that class of men of which Morgan, Schwab, Keene and Whitney are striking examples, men who are endowed with a knack for seizing opportunities, and for turning golden currents into their coffers by strategic manipulation that savors of psychological intuition. About twenty years ago Dingee came to this city from Pennsylvania where his father is engaged in the seed-raising industry. He obtained a clerkship in the office of Easton & Eldridge and soon familiarized himself with the real estate market. When the boom struck Oakland about fifteen years ago Dingee went over the bay, bought a small tract of land and divided it up into town lots which he sold, making a handsome profit. Then he went into the business of dividing outside tracts on a large scale, and thus he laid the foundation of his fortune.

Evolution of a Water Magnate

One of his large investments was in the Piedmont hills, but he found it difficult to sell because he could not obtain a water supply from Oakland. However he decided to develop a water supply of his own and he did so. He obtained water by a catchment system in the hills, and so abundant was the supply that he proceeded to sell some of it. He gradually extended the system until the Contra Costa company, of which Henry Pierce was the head, began to object to competition. Dingee was threatened with reprisal and he became indignant and declared that if steps were taken to injure him he would lay a pipe down Broadway. The company, conscious of its strength, sought to wipe out competition by supplying some of Dingee's patrons with free water, and about that time he formed an alliance with Alvinza Hayward through his brother-in-law, A. W. Rose, who was married to the millionaire's daughter. With the assistance of Hayward he brought water from the artesian belt at Alvarado, laid a main down Broadway, and proceeded to give the Contra Costa Company battle. It was a very bitter rate war that followed, and it was kept up for years, during which the people of Oakland were supplied with water for almost nothing. The average household paid less than twenty-five cents a month for water. Finally the company grew weary, and one day a deal was made by which Dingee absorbed the corporation and became a millionaire. That was six or seven years ago, and in those days Dingee was the most popular man in Oakland. So popular was he that a municipal ticket known as the Dingee ticket was elected by a large majority. After the consolidation water rates were raised to defray the expenses of the war and the people of Oakland have been howling ever since.

His Latest Ventures

But Dingee is interested in other things besides water. He is one of the shrewdest and most enterprising men in this State, and he is always willing to take a chance. He is ever on the alert for a good thing and he is quick to take hold of a scheme that promises rich returns. And like all men of his class he is aggressive in furthering his own interests. A few years ago he became interested in a slate quarry in El Dorado county, and he soon built a large plant and made it pay. One day he discovered limestone deposits near the slate quarry, and he immediately began studying the cement industry. After considerable research he concluded that there was big money in cement. He went East and secured the services of the best cement expert in the United States. The man was connected with the Lehigh Valley road, and did not want to leave, but Dingee offered him twenty-five thousand a year and secured his services. The expert did not favor the limestone deposit near the slate mine, but Dingee had resolved to go into the cement business and he soon located another deposit at Napa Junction. Then he capitalized a company and spent six hundred thousand dollars in building a plant. Now the company is paying five per cent on ten millions.

Made His Friends Rich

Despite his absorbing passion for the accumulation of money, Dingee is a most genial companion and very unselfish when his friends are concerned. He proved his unselfishness in his cement enterprise by allowing several of his friends to share in his fortune. Through that venture he enabled Will Henshaw to make half a million dollars, and the latter's brother, Justice Fred Henshaw, gathered in about a quarter of a million, all within the last year. Senator Frank Moffitt of Oakland was also taken in, and I believe he profited to the extent of one hundred thousand. Tom Dargie, the postmaster of Oakland, Emil Nusbaumer and Alex Vogelsang were each vouchsafed a slice and each is richer by ten thousand. So there is a side to the character of Dingee which you cannot learn about over in Oakland, though in the old days whenever popular subscriptions were being solicited across the bay his check was always double that of any other person. That was before he began charging all the traffic would bear for water. It's a pretty stiff rate but it's good water, and that is more than can be said for our giant monopoly's commodity on this side of the bay. Dingee is now a resident of this city. He bought the old Baker residence at the corner of Franklin and Washington streets, and there his wife, who by the way was the widow of General Dodge, has spent a quarter of a million dollars on interior decorations. She is a cultured woman who has traveled extensively, and she takes great pride in her home, which is the most artistic in this city. She has no social aspirations, but to her friends she is the most genial of hostesses.

"I did not care to go to a summer resort this year," said Mrs. Pacific Heights, "you see, I am suffering from neurosis and could not stand a flirtation even of a mild nature."

When Confederate Daughters Disagree

The members of Albert Sidney Johnston chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy over which Mrs. Voorhies has presided ever since the resignation of Mrs. Van Wyck are very indignant over the latter's version of the origin of the rival chapter. According to Madame La Bavarde, who acted as the mouthpiece of Mrs. Van Wyck, the division of Albert Sidney Johnston chapter was urged by Mrs. Edwin G. Weed, the wife of the Bishop of Florida and Grand President of the order, upon her visit to this city. She was represented as having begged Mrs. Van Wyck to found the second chapter. The members of Albert Sidney Johnston chapter are quite positive that Mrs. Weed never had a hand in the matter. Moreover they think it does that lady a grievous injustice to charge her with the exceedingly bad taste of sowing dissension in Sidney Johnston chapter at a time when she was being entertained by its members. They say that she remarked to several of the members that the field here was not large enough for two chapters, and that if there was any member not in accord with the others it would be far better for her to join a Los Angeles chapter rather than to attempt to start another one here. Either Mrs. Weed was guilty of what is known as the "double-cross," or else somebody grossly deceived Madame La Bavarde. At any rate the testimony relative to the organization of the second chapter is of a contradictory character. Among ladies, especially Southern ladies and daughters of Southern gentlemen, such things should not happen.

Let Us Have the Facts

Now comes Madame La Bavarde, by way of retort to the contradiction of the Daughters, stating that she received her information concerning the inspiration of the second chapter "from a source not to be discredited." But it has been discredited, and by the ladies who know and who entertained Mrs. Weed, and who do not believe that she would give them the "double cross." She also asserts that she made the statement in response to the charge that the trouble originated between two ladies, "both anxious for social prominence." The two ladies are of course Mrs. Voorhies and Mrs. Van Wyck. "At any rate," she continues, "I know it was a mistake, and I thought it wise to give what I considered the correct version of the affair." But the ladies of Sidney Johnston chapter take issue with Madame La Bavarde, or rather with Mrs. Salisbury, for I believe the society leader is still writing the Bulletin's social gush under the familiar nom de plume. So instead of retracting the lady reiterates, for she says she knows, and that the source of her information is not to be discredited. And in conclusion she suggests that the Daughters refer the matter to Mrs. Weed herself, providing they consider it "worth while." I am almost tempted to doubt for the nonce that Madame La Bavarde is Mrs. Salisbury, for the latter is a Confederate daughter herself; the blood of the South flows in her veins, and surely she would consider it worth while to sift the matter to the bottom, considering that there is a question of honor involved. It was kind of her to seek to vindicate her friend Mrs. Van Wyck when the latter was charged with having divided the chapter to gratify her social ambition, but in doing so she cast unpleasant reflections on Mrs. Weed, the wife of a Bishop and Grand President of the order. No doubt she would like to have the matter dropped, but it has assumed too grave a phase to be lightly dismissed.

Her Sympathy With the South

I do not know whether Mrs. Salisbury is a member of either of the Confederate chapters but I should be surprised if she were not, for she comes from a very ardent "chiv" family. The Southern cause never had a warmer sympathizer than her father, Tod Robinson. He was one of the most conspicuous representatives of the Southern element which controlled Californian politics in the '50's. The "chivs" were judicious enough to allow "honest" John Big-ler, a Pennsylvanian, to be twice elected Governor, but they got all the governors during that early period. In the sixties they were quite numerous in Sacramento, where the Robinsons resided, and where Miss Kate Robinson began her career as a social arbitre. When the news of the assassination of Lincoln was received the ire of the Union element in Sacramento was aroused, and the younger men and boys visited the homes of several of the prominent Southern people and compelled them to raise the American flag as a token of loyalty. Among the homes visited was that of Tod Robinson, and a call was made for Miss Kate, who appeared on the balcony, gallantly saluted the flag and sang one stanza of "The Star Spangled Banner." Another home visited was that of the McDonalds, and Miss Mattie, the beautiful sister of the late Doctor McDonald, and of Captain Jim, Mark and Jasper, was summoned. But she was treated with great courtesy for the leader of the party was Frank Swift, who was in love with her and who subsequently married her.

A Sad, Sad Blow

The infinite importance of this paragraph must have deeply impressed all readers of Madame La Bavarde's gush last Monday night:

The McClungs have no thought of going to Monterey this month.

No doubt this brief announcement caused many people to speculate as to whether the determination of the McClungs to remain at home would abruptly terminate the program of festivities at Del Monte. Perhaps some people who had looked forward to a month of gaiety at Monterey concluded, upon reading the sensational news, that the management of Del Monte would immediately close the doors of the big hotel. Upon inquiry, I was informed that the hotel was doing business as of yore, and that notwithstanding the absence of the McClungs the festivities were in full blast. Amazed at the receipt of this information, I asked the clerk if the management did not intend to signify in some way its great distress over the absence of the McClungs, and this is what came back over the 'phone, "Who in hell are the McClungs?" This astounding blasphemy from one of the profanum vulgus was an awful shock.

It Lacked Eclat

On the heels of Madame La Bavarde's sensational announcement came the report of the marriage of Miss Alma McClung and Lieutenant Horne of the Alert. I presume the bride is one of the McClungs, though, if so, it is surprising that the marriage was given such brief notice—only about fifteen lines—in the Bulletin. But then Miss Alma was very negligent in failing to notify the Bavarde that she was engaged. Madame La Bavarde does not approve of such heterodox secrecy in affairs of the heart, and besides she dearly loves a splurge marriage. The McClung-Horne marriage was a very quiet and refined affair—not a bit of ostentatious vulgarity about it, the only witnesses being Major and Mrs. McClung and Miss Gladys. Another objectionable feature, from the standpoint of the spectacle-loving society push, was the heart interest involved. The bride and groom were true lovers, and there is no wealth on either side. Consequently the match did not meet with general approval. But the young people are well satisfied. The bride is a sensible young woman and pretty. Lieutenant Horne is a very popular and manly young officer. It was not a brilliant, but an excellent match.

The News From Rome

Those brilliant correspondents at the Vatican who were engaged for weeks in writing all they didn't know about the affairs of the Catholic Church and its Cardinals must have felt somewhat chagrined over the election of the Patriarch of Venice to the Papal throne. He was about the only member of the Sacred College who was not mentioned as an available man. According to those brilliant correspondents the Cardinals were engaged in "doing politics" even before Pope Leo died, and there were several prominent candidates over whose claims to the high distinction there would be a firece contest. Rampolla, Vannutelli and Oreglia were the arch politicians who were doing all the manipulation, with the "fine Italian hand" of which we read so much, but when the result was declared it was learned that one of the humblest of the Cardinals had been chosen, and that he was not the protege of any of the alleged bosses of the conclave. The only person who predicted that Cardinal Sarto would figure in the election was Maud Howe, the brilliant daughter of Julia Ward Howe, and she merely stated that he would be the choice of the Italian party which she surmised, no doubt, because it was generally known that he enjoyed the friendship of the royal family.

The Quirinal and the Vatican

Even that famous Irish saint who is said to have predicted the election of numerous Popes appears to have been all wrong, so far as Leo's successor was concerned. He predicted that Leo would be succeeded by a Cardinal who had an Ignis Ardens in his coat of arms. There are three Cardinals who could have fulfilled the prophecy—Oreglia, Svampa and Gotti—but they were among the also rans. When the banner bearing Sarto's coat of arms was flung to the breeze after his election, nobody in the immense throng in front of St. Peter's could tell to whom it belonged, a circumstance significant of his obscurity. Pope Pius X is no doubt persona grata to the Italian government, but that fact did not influence the conclave. The question of the relations between the Holy See and Italy has been modified by the lapse of years. Between Pius IX and Victor Immanuel II the question could not be settled. The former had been deprived of actual sovereignty and the latter, a devout Catholic, who had had the temporal power before his eyes all his life, was not inclined to press the Papacy hard. With Leo XIII and Humbert it was different. The King was more ready to assert the rights of the state, but he was held in check by the devoutness of Queen Margherita. Now the Catholic traditions of the royal house are weaker than ever, and the new Pope ascends a throne that has been deprived of temporal power for a whole generation. In that time the power of the church throughout Christendom has increased marvelously, and in part on account of the loss of sovereignty. Yet it was well understood among Catholic ecclesiastics that any candidate openly advocated by the Italian government would have had no chance of success. The Government needs the friendship of the Church far more than does the Church that of the Government.

Cardinal Rampolla

If the Associated Press correspondents knew anything of the affairs of the Catholic Church they would never have discussed the probable leaning of a new Pope toward some particular nation. The new era in the Church and Papacy impose and demand but one policy, that of the fundamental interests of the church. The correspondents have made many ridiculous statements concerning Cardinal Rampolla, picturing him as a past-master of intrigue. If there ever was a man free from personal interests it is Cardinal Rampolla. He was the man in whom Leo XIII reposed implicit confidence and Leo chose his Cardinals in his last consistories who were friends of Rampolla in order that they might be electors of a Pope who should continue his policy. His whole life has been devoted to the interests of the church and his mind is far above the dusty battleground of political intrigue. His motto is: "We must serve only the Holy See, and the Church." He fulfills the duties of the office of Secretary of State, as he sings high mass—in a spirit of beauty. He is a mystic, discreet, impenetrable and inaccessible to intrigue. His aim is to develop the powers of Catholicism and to win back the independence of the Holy See. He could have made the Pope if he wished it, and the probability is that he did. He has long been a sort of Vice-Pope whom the Church has been accustomed to see at the head of its government.

An Accomplished Diplomat

Those who have met this powerful Secretary of State have been charmed by his grand air, which is tempered by an amiability and gentleness that bespeak a sweet nature and poetic mind. His modesty is such that when, according to custom, people stoop to kiss his hand he stretches out his arms instinctively, offering to the visitor only the palms of his open hands, as though he were about to affectionately embrace. And this intellectual giant leads a life of asceticism and prayer. The Ambassadors of the Powers with whom he has frequent relations consider him an accomplished diplomat who inspires you with his opinions while seeming to ask for yours. For sixteen years he has held in his hands all the threads of worldly politics, and he is familiar with the political, social and moral interests of the whole world. And now it is said that he is to be removed, and that he will cease to be the guiding influence behind the throne of Peter. Should a substitute be named it will more than likely be for the reason that Rampolla feels that Pope Pius X is not in need of his services, and that he prefers to resign the cares of office.

The Hero of Folsom

History repeats the dying words of many great men. Cambronne, commander of the Old Guard, the personal attendant of the great Napoleon, after the overthrow of the Corsican at Waterloo, when the magnificent army was fleeing from the field, replied to the British officer who demanded his surrender, "The Old Guard dies, but never surrenders." Lord Nelson, bleeding to death on the deck of his battleship, the Victory, when informed that the French fleet had been utterly destroyed, said, "I die content." Another hero whose name has slipped my memory and who laid down his life in defence of his country, exclaimed with his dying breath, "It is sweet to die for one's country." Arnold Winkelreid, in attempting to make a breach in the ranks of the foe is credited with having exclaimed with his last breath, "Make way for liberty." And coming down to the present generation I recall the case of a Captain of the Guard at the Carson penitentiary, an uncle of Garret McEnerney of this city, who when seized by escaping convicts and held before them for protection commanded the guards in these words: "Do your duty—Fire!" The command was obeyed, the convicts were captured and the captain lived to be presented with a watch by the Legislature of Nevada. All these heroes have been eclipsed by the gallant Warden Wilkinson of Folsom, who when captured by the convicts exclaimed, in firm but pleading tones, "Don't shoot! Don't shoot!"

A warden of a penitentiary is supposed to meet bravely all the chances incident to his position. It was his duty to sacrifice his own life rather than permit a band of cutthroats to escape and terrorize a whole community. Cochrane, the prison guard who fought valiantly, says that if Wilkinson and Murphy had done likewise the escape would have been prevented. As a result of Wilkinson's cowardice five brave men have sacrified their lives. Wilkinson should not be permitted to resign. He should be dismissed. This Folsom outbreak teaches the necessity of appointing capable men to positions of trust in our penitentiaries.

Fads of Oakland's Aristocrats

The notion prevails among the provincial aristocracy of Oakland that before one can be properly branded with the hallmark of the elite it is necessary to affect the British conceit of a home with a romantic title. Hence the fad of attaching to one's abode an appellation with an appendix such as "villa," "dale," "crest," "croft," "vale," etc. So the readers of the social columns of the Oakland dailies are frequently being informed that the F. M. Smiths are all well at "Arbor Villa"; that the Havens's gave a lavish spread at "Thorndale"; that the Gowings have given up "Ivy Cottage," or that the Valentines have returned to "Cedar Croft." Fads that bespeak a love of ostentation have a great fascination for the socially ambitious of mushroom growth in the burg across the bay. The Japanese waiting maid is the latest evidence of sudden prosperity out in the Lakeside district, and she may be seen trailing through the streets after her mistress when the latter is shopping. Even down Broadway go mistress and Oriental bachelor girl on Saturday afternoons. Whether the exotic damsel is for protection, or is merely performing the functions of a dray for the toting of remnants gathered at a Saturday afternoon bargain sale, is a problem that the habitues of the suburban highway yearn to solve.

The "Borax King" and His Yacht

News comes from the East that the F. M. Smiths of Oakland are cutting quite a swath in the waters near Shelter Island, on board a magnificent cruising yacht. It is a much larger and more sumptuously appointed yacht than the one in which the Smiths dazzled the Easterners last year, and it bears the same name—the Hanoli. Mrs. F. M. Smith, Miss Marion Smith, Miss May Burge, Miss Florence Nightingale and Miss Evelyn Ellis are among those who have entertained aboard the new craft. The Smiths have a beautiful summer residence at Sag Harbor and near them are the Havens family of Piedmont, who are also burrowing into the social realm of Greater New York.

A New Punch-Bowl for Berkeley

Last week a jolly crowd of college professors gathered beneath the roof-tree of Berekeley's Faculty Club on the campus to while away an evening's hour in song and story at the punch-bowl's brim. The affair was in the nature of a smoker given by Summer School professors to the members of the Faculty Club, an organization for the blowing of rings of thought-inspiring smoke into the cultured atmosphere. The hosts were Professor Robert Herrick of the University of Chicago, Professors George Carpenter and Munroe of Columbia, Professor C. P. Bourland of Western Reserve University. Professor Herrick, in behalf of the visiting pedagogues, presented the Faculty Club with an elegant cut-glass punch-bowl. Professor Stringam, president of the Club, made a felicitous speech in expressing the gratitude of his colleagues, and then the merry academicians sampled a punch made in the new bowl.

Separation of a Newly Wedded Couple

Oakland society is agog over the separation of a newly wedded couple who have been married less than three months. The wedding took place in the East, whither the groom went with his usual accompaniment of best man, ushers, and so forth. The newly married pair were presented with a new house and all was merry as the traditional marriage bell. Then, suddenly, a string broke somewhere. The groom left his bride, whose pictures were still appearing in the newspapers, and the couple have not lived together since. The groom will not tell his nearest relatives the reason of the rupture but asserts that it is final and that he never intends going back. It is all dreadfully sad as both parties are very young. Why can there not be mutual toleration and patience in marriage? Nothing else but these and much love make it possible.

And Weill Fainted

Just before his departure for France Raphael Weill had an amusing experience at Marchand's. He was accompanied by an Easterner who posed as a bon vivant, and Weill undertook to give him a few gastronomic surprises. A very old and rare claret had been warmed to just the proper temperature and was served. The host raised his glass, tested it, and then lapsed into ecstacy from which he was rudely awakened by his guest, who was saying softly to the waiter, "Here, sir, bring me some ice! this claret isn't cold." As the ice clinked in the glass the waiter's eyes twinkled, but the host had to be revived from a dead faint.

The Snubbing of Transients

There is blood in the owl's eye up at the Bohemian Club, and all because of certain amendments to the constitution adopted at a recent meeting, and for which President James D. Phelan is said to be responsible. One of the most important applies to transient members. The members of the faculty and academic staff of any university, and officers of the army or navy of the United States on the active list, have always been admitted to the club as transient members, on a monthly payment of one-half the regular dues. They were excluded merely from the right of voting or holding office, but under the amendment they are also excluded from the right of making proposals for membership or issuing visitors' cards. This is regarded as an awful slap in the fact of every army and navy officer and every university representative now enjoying the privileges of the club as a transient member. It has caused a great flutter in club circles. Incidentally it should be stated that it will probably cause the withdrawal of many transient members. "Why was such an insulting amendment adopted?" is the question one hears on all sides. Nobody appears to know, but President Jimmy Phelan is said to be the responsible party. "I guess Prince Poniatowski knew what he was talking about when he made a few pertinent remarks about Jimmy on a certain memorable occasion," said a club man during a discussion of the amendment at the Pacific-Union Club.

Price of Packages to be Raised

At the same meeting of the club at which transient members were told that they could not be trusted with the privilege of differentiating gentlemen from cads, an amendment was adopted raising the entrance fee for admission from one hundred to two hundred dollars, and the monthly dues from five to six dollars. The parentage of this amendment is also attributed to millionaire Jimmy, who is said to be anxious to make the club more exclusive and less bohemian than it has heretofore been. Mr. Phelan is a very energetic executive, and his friends say that he has a lot of reform measures up his sleeve which he proposes springing in installments. He is said to be in favor of raising the price of drinks to twenty-five cents, but he doesn't think it wise to propose the raise until there are fewer struggling artists and literary chaps in the club. He is probably dreaming of the day when there will be no possibility of an indigent sculptor raising his voice from a bed in the County Hospital to remind the plutocrats of the Post street club that they once associated with him. However the spirit of bohemianism is not yet dead in the Bohemian Club and protests against the Phelan policy may yet be raised.

The Bohemian Club camp is now in readiness for the midsummer jinks. Joe Redding and other members who live in the East came on last week and went into camp. Last Sunday there were only about twenty-five members in camp for Paul the Indian and the other helpers to minister unto, but a large party went up this week to join them, and the rest will go this afternoon. The camp is much more comfortable this year than in former seasons, many improvements having been made in the sleeping accommodations. The tents are placed in a different location. Many are pitched by the side of the hills, and have steps leading up to them. Boarded floors are another improvement. While many of the Bohemians will return after the jinks tomorrow, others will stay over a few days and recuperate from the exhaustion induced by the strenuous cremation of Care.

BORJES & BENSON, 1001 Market Street, corner of Sixth, carry none but the Finest Imported and Domestic Wines and Liquors. Polite treatment, quick service, fine goods and popular prices have made this house one of the favorite resorts of the city.

At the Low Jinks

One of the hits of the low jinks which takes place tonight will be Richard Hotaling's imitation of Jack Wilson. Mr. Wilson will be Montezuma in the High Jinks and Hotaling will be Mazuma in the low. Hotaling is scheduled, among many other things, to do a killing burlesque of Wilson's adventures in the Yosemite Valley while preparing the wonderful reception for President Roosevelt. The monologue runs something like this:

"Are the redlights here? Where's the biggest owl? Where's the Governor—send George down. Is there wine enough, Mr. Johnson?"

Mr. Johnson meekly replies that there is plenty of wine and the prompt retort is, "Well then send down some."

Jack Wilson is dreading the jinks. The Presidential fiasco is the one thing he is sensitive about and he is pretty sure they are going to strike at his most vulnerable spot.

Sacrificing a Moustache for Art's Sake

Charles K. Field, Bohemia's principal poet, is going about these days minus a hirsute adornment that was quite the size of an eyebrow. He was obliged to sacrifice the ornament because of the part he was to play in the Low Jinks. He posed for the works of Aitken in various degrees of slender nudeness and his "Art Lured by Bohemia," with its abandon, which distinguishes the Jinks Room of the Bohemian Club, is a most realistic reproduction. Jack Wilson, the Montezuma in the High Jinks and the much burlesqued and satirized Mazuma of the Low, almost spoiled the Indian Jinks of last year by not knowing his lines. Though the author of them reclined at the chief's feet and tried to prompt him, Mr. Wilson floundered so that even the scribe forgot the lines he had written. This year Wilson is letter-perfect—he could say his lines backward and forward, up and down like Chinese writing—any way.

The Potent Tip

The crush in the Yosemite valley this year was greater than ever before, and I am told that the tipping system has so corrupted the hotel servants that people of moderate means who cannot afford to be as generous as some of the prodigal tourists suffer very much from the "overlook." The school teachers who are always quite numerous in the valley complain bitterly of the cupidity of the hotel waitress and her arrogant indifference to those who do not tip generously and often. It was remarked that nobody was so promptly served as the Princess Poniatowski and it was learned that at her first meal she handed out a double eagle to stimulate a lively sense of favors to come. Simple gowns were the rule this season with all save the members of the De Young party who arrayed themselves in the evening in Paris frocks. They excited a great deal of admiration.

Mrs. Jones: "I hear they celebrated a birthday at the Brides' home yesterday."

Mrs. Smith: "I wasn't invited. Who were the guests?"

Mrs. Jones: "Just the doctor and nurse. It was a boy."

An Infant Revelation

The friends of a prominent society woman are enjoying what they regard as a big joke on a distinguished citizen. This woman has a little girl aged four and one day she had the child with her, unaccompanied by her nurse, and stopped at the Orpheum to purchase some tickets. As they passed the French restaurant which is situated just below the theatre, the child, who is old-fashioned and precocious, looked up at the doorway and said, reflectively, "I had lunch there yesterday with Tom and Therese." It should be said in explanation that Tom was a friend and frequent guest of the family and that Therese was the child's nurse. The next day Therese was persuaded by the mistress of the house that nursing was not her real vocation and since then she has realized her possibilities and has won renown as an artist's model.

How Amelia Bingham Was Floored

At a tea given the other day by a lady fond of entertaining celebrities, Miss Amelia Bingham and Joaquin Miller were the guests of honor. When the pretty blonde actress was presented to the wild and woolly poet, she murmured a few of those polite nothings suitable to the occasion.

"Really, I'm delighted to meet you, Mr. Milier," she said. "I have read much of you, and your poems have given me much pleasure."

"Look out," said the poet, growling to match his beard, "liars are fried in hell."

Miss Bingham was completely nonplussed. She said afterward that she thought, "What have I met?" and concluded that she would go home after a few minutes. Joaquin realized that some one had blundered, and, taking the lady's dainty white gloved hand, kissed it fervently in the little uncovered place on the palm and apologized prettily. Thereafter they became great friends, Joaquin attending the theatre as the star's guest and the lady received an autographed copy of his latest work, "As It Was in the Beginning." This is the volume printed a la Japonica, and on the title page is a picture of a stork with a little Theodore Roosevelt in its bill. Theodore is rather undressed and looks like the baby photography so popular twenty years ago. Joaquin with a pen had drawn a sketch of the bouncing boy, and in the inside pinned over five or six pages appropriately with large sized safety pins. On the fly leaf the author wrote, "These pages are pinned up. When you are grown up you may read them," which is a very pretty compliment to the lady's age.

Rivals for Miss Helen's Hand

The tabbies are discussing the very lively race between young Ed Tobin and "Addy" Mizner for the favor of Mrs. De Young's eldest daughter. Helen De Young has more attractions than the average society girl, for she is not only pretty and rich, with the experience gained by travel and association with the best continental society, but she has a lively wit of her own and a most gracious manner that she inherits from her mother. Long before she made her debut in San Francisco she had seen society in other cities, beside enjoying that of the clever people it is her mother's pleasure to entertain at her home. And the upbringing of the De Young sisters has been after an excellent model, vastly different from that of the average girl. Mrs. De Young does not believe in mere elaborate functions that gather all sorts of dull people together. When she entertains it is with a view of giving her guests a real pleasure, in which brains as well as fun figure. Since Helen's debut she has been invited everywhere, and has been sought by many suitors. But as yet, it is said, she has shown no intention of engaging herself to anybody. However, the continued and open admiration of the youngest Tobin and that of the plump and jolly young Mizner has led the gossips to assert that one of them stands a good chance of winning Miss De Young.

The Welsh-Costello Wedding

A very pretty wedding was solemnized in Holy Cross church on Wednesday morning, when Miss Mary G. Welsh, daughter of Thomas J. Welsh the architect, was united to Richard W. Costello. The bride was attended by her sisters and Miss Costello. The ceremony was performed by Reverend Father McGinty, and a beautiful feature of the service was the music rendered by the organ, an orchestra, Harry Barnhart, basso, and the soprano soloists, Mrs. Lenore Greven and Miss Marie Welsh. Miss Welsh, by the way, is the bride's cousin. She is one of the best coloratura singers San Francisco has ever produced and her Michaela in "Carmen" at the Tivoli ranks with that of Suzanne Adams.

Russell-Webster

The prettiest weddings are nearly all of them celebrated at St. Luke's church, which lends itself gracefully to decoration. That of Miss Ada May Russell and George Albert Webster on Wednesday evening was charming in every detail. After the ceremony there was a reception at the apartments of the bride's mother in St. Dunstan's. The bride is a very attractive young woman who has traveled considerably abroad and in this country. Her two elder sisters, Jean and Pauline, were married a good many years ago, one to Edgar Painter and the other to Dr. Edward Younger. The two little daughters of the former were flower girls at the wedding Wednesday night.

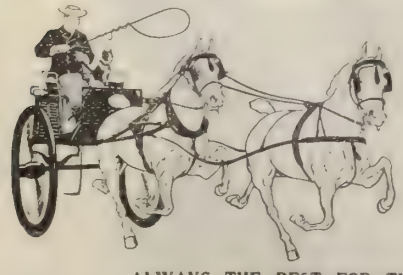
To Be Married in the Old Mission

Miss Vesta Shortridge and Emil Bruguiere are to be married in the old San Carlos mission church some time next month or in October. The date depends on whether young Bruguiere can tear himself away from the Bostonians, who will produce his opera in "the provinces" before showing it to New York. Miss Shortridge is preparing a stunning trousseau. The dainty lingerie was a gift from her father, who sent to New York for it. After the marriage the young couple will live in Monterey, but they will take a wedding trip first that will include Newport and Europe.

Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker has returned from Manitou, Colorado Springs, and will resume teaching next Monday.

Corbett's Generosity

There is always space in these columns for the recording of a generous act. Last Sunday, just before the opening performance of "As You Like It" on Sutro Heights, a feeling of grave disappointment settled upon the mummers who were to take part. The attendance was not large, and the financial aspect was as gloomy as the day for those who had expected to swell the depleted bank account of Nance O'Neil. That talented actress has met with many reverses of late, and they have been especially hard to bear for they threaten to put the quietus on her hope of storming Broadway and achieving the conquest of the metropolis. Managers Rankin and Stockwell had hoped to draw large crowds to Sutro Heights, but the cold weather dampened the ardor of Nance O'Neil's admirers. James J. Corbett had been engaged to appear as Charles the Wrestler and he was to have received six hundred dollars for the four performances, but when he saw the slender attendance he went to Mr. Stockwell and asked, "Are you or Rankin going to get any money out of this?"



"No, we are not," was the reply.

"Then I don't want any, either," said the pugilist, "Nance O'Neil may have my share, too."

This generosity was in striking contrast, I am told, to the conduct of one of the leading actors of the company, who wanted his money before going on. It has been frequently stated of late that Nance O'Neil had made arrangements to appear in New York but there have been several hitches. Billy Brady, Frank Perley and Frank McKee have each considered a proposition to manage her in New York, but they failed to come to terms with Rankin.

Amelia's Advice

Every one is wondering whether Edwards Davis has been engaged by Amelia Bingham or not. He says that he has—she says that he has not—and she ought to know. The Oakland papers have had it that Davis was to be Miss Bingham's leading juvenile and she says that she has never seen him act. Those who have say that he is atrocious. However, he recently lunched with Miss Bingham on which occasion she gave him some good advice, telling him to cease advertising himself as an ex-preacher and get down to work if he ever wanted to advance in his profession. They say that the acting and the writing in "The Unmasking" were quite the worst things ever seen or heard in Oakland, which is saying a good deal.

A Romantic Second Courtship

In the despatches a few days ago was a story from New York which was no doubt read with great interest by many society people. It was the story of the trial of a suit against the estate of the late Kinsley Magoun, the wealthy New York banker. His handsome young widow was on the stand and she was asked many embarrassing questions about Henry Alexander, the brother of Charley Alexander, husband of Hattie Crocker. Among other questions she was asked if she was not known in some parts of Europe as Mrs. Henry Alexander and whether she had not registered as the wife of Henry Alexander. She declined to answer. The natural inference is that Henry Alexander has again been leading a gay life in Europe. About eight years ago the wife of Henry Alexander, who was formerly Miss Grace Green, a New York heiress, came to this city to obtain a divorce from her husband on account of his infidelities. She was a very charming woman and made many friends while here. After obtaining the divorce she went back to New York, and a few years later her friends were surprised to learn that she had married Alexander a second time. To one of her friends in this city she wrote an interesting account of the second courtship. She related that her former husband, who had become a resident of Paris, returned to New York to seek reconciliation but she repulsed him. However, he was very persistent and pleaded with her up to the hour of the departure of the steamer on which he had reserved accommodations for his trip back to Europe. She remained firm and he went away looking like a broken-hearted man. That night at a late hour she was aroused from her slumbers by a caller, and much to her surprise Alexander again presented himself. He explained that the storm off Sandy Hook was so fierce that the captain had put back to port. Believing that Providence had ordained his return he resolved to try again. This time he was successful. He was forgiven and they were hastily married and departed on the belated steamer.

Lane's Feet Growing Cold

The Chronicle having exposed Franklin K. Lane's remarkable apathy in the suit brought to compel the Southern Pacific Company to remove its Mission tracks, that gentleman has about decided that he will not accept the Democratic nomination for Mayor. Mr. Lane is no fool. The records show that as City Attorney he permitted a motion for a new trial in a case decided against the Southern Pacific Company to be dropped from the calendar, and that though two years have passed he never caused it to be restored. Under the circumstances it would not be wise for him to accept the nomination for Mayor. The Chronicle's expose has merely served to corroborate what I have frequently asserted concerning the friendship existing between the bright young city attorney and the quasi-public corporations. Renewed efforts are now being made to induce Charles J. Heggerty, the well known and popular young partner of George Knight, to consent to run. Heggerty is one of the most eminent members of the legal profession, a man noted for his integrity as well as for his legal attainments, and he would undoubtedly be a strong candidate. It is important that a man of legal ability should be elected Mayor if we are to make another effort to create a bonded debt for the purpose of raising money for public improvement. We voted to create such a debt a few years ago, and then it was learned, when too late, that Franklin K. Lane in his capacity as City Attorney had fatally blundered, vitiating everything that had been done.

Why Vivian Is Grateful

Mrs. Burton Harrison did not accompany her son, Burton Harrison and her daughter-in-law, Mary Crocker Harrison, on their trip to the coast. She preferred to remain in the East with her close friend, Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett Townsend. Anent Mrs. Burnett a funny story is brought to mind. When Vivian Burnett, Mrs. Burnett's younger son, was here some two years ago, he was much feted. While here Burnett pointed out a passer-by on the street and said:

"See that man?" The friend could see him.

"Well," Burnett continued, "I owe that man a debt of undying gratitude." His hearer was interested.

"You see," Burnett went on, "that man was a friend of my mother and when I was born she was going to call me Cecil. That man talked her out of the notion and they compromised on Vivian."

The hearer smiled—he was debating as to which he should dislike more to be called—Cecil or Vivian.

Judge Murphy's Banner Story

Apropos of the escape from Folsom and the statement that convict Gordon is making for Sacramento where he intends to kill Judge Hart who sentenced him to forty-five years, even if he hangs for it, the lawyers who lunch at the Bar Association are repeating Judge Murphy's banner story —and not a bad one, either—of a hair-raising experience which befell the good-natured judge during a visit to Folsom. Judge Murphy was rather hard on criminals. He had a way of piling on the years just as Judge Lawlor does, and he was not popular in the penitentiaries. One day he sent a man up for forty years for robbery and he heard afterward that the fellow said that he'd kill Murphy if he had to hire somebody on the outside to do the job. It was five years after that, and Judge Murphy had forgotten all about the experience when he went to Folsom one day to visit Warden Aull. He had such a pleasant time that he stayed overnight in order to be present at a dinner which Mrs. Aull, who was a handsome and attractive woman, was giving the next night. Judge Murphy had taken his evening clothes with him but he had not counted on remaining so long and he had omitted to pack his razors.

"That's nothing," said the warden, "we have an excellent barber shop in the prison. I never shave myself. Come in and get a shave."

The Thrilling Shave

Judge Murphy followed his host, was ushered into a delightfully clean place and sat down in the chair while he chatted with the warden. The apron was tied about his neck, his face was lathered by a light-handed young chap and then the barber came in and commenced to strop his razor. Judge Murphy was in the midst of a sentence when he looked into the barber's face—the man about to shave him was the man he had sent up forty years and who had vowed to have the judge's life blood. Judge Murphy's blood froze in his veins. He looked into the barber's eye—it glittered.

"Well, my life isn't worth twenty cents," he thought to himself. "He'll do me, sure. He looks it."

The barber's mouth tightened and he drew the razor lovingly across the judge's throat. "Never," says the judge, "was a man so deliberate in shaving. He shaved me one way; he shaved me another; and there I sat perfectly helpless." At last, after the barber had prolonged the torture as long as possible, the judge was released. His tormenter's eyes actually sparkled and the judge was chalky white from suspense. As the judge was leaving the barber shop he told the warden the story.

"I'd have reduced that fellow's sentence to twenty years at that moment if I'd had the power," the judge always says in finishing the story, "for I'd served twenty years myself in those few awful moments." The Murphys, by the way, have been in Europe for the past year. Traveling is Mrs. Murphy's sole delight and they have been having a charming time. They had an audience with the Pope while he was still in good health.

Ward-Dufficy

A newly announced engagement that is interesting friends of the principals here and in San Rafael is that of Miss Irene Ward, daughter of M. J. Ward, and Charles M. Dufficy, son of Judge and Mrs. M. C. Dufficy of Marin. Miss Ward is a charming young woman, convent reared, having received her education at Sacred Heart convent. Mr. Dufficy is a cousin of the beautiful Murphy sisters of whom the eldest married Sir Charles Wolseley. The wedding is to be at St. Dominic's and will be an elaborate affair. Miss Mindred Ward will be maid of honor, and the Misses Alicia and Elizabeth Dufficy the attendant bridesmaids. Rafael G. Dufficy will be the best man. After the wedding there will be a three months' honeymoon trip to Japan.

David Wilder—one of the Hawaiian Wilders—who has been studying art in Paris for several years, is on his homeward way to Honolulu. Mr. Wilder married Miss Harndon of Alameda.

Mrs. Dutton Returned

Mrs. Samuel E. Dutton is again at home, after an absence of five years in New York. Her youngest daughter, who has been pursuing her studies in the East, will probably be among the debutantes this winter. She is a very pretty girl and resembles her mother. Lottie, the eldest of the Dutton sisters, married a New York man many years ago, shortly after her debut, and "Lulie," the second sister, married an army chaplain who left her a young widow. They are granddaughters of James King of William, founder of the Bulletin, and Mrs. Russell J. Wilson is their aunt.

Ella Morgan Married

News of the marriage of Ella Morgan in London came to my ears in the early part of the week. She is a daughter of the founder of the Morgan Oyster Company. She was conspicuous at some of the Presidio hops last winter, and at that time there were rumors of her engagement to a young mining promoter. Indeed I heard that her mother planned the trip abroad in the hope of breaking off the attachment, and since the news of the marriage was received the young man's friends have stated that he was jilted; also, that he had implicit confidence in Miss Morgan's constancy and was greatly distressed when he heard the news of the marriage. Alphonse Pellins, of Antwerp, who is said to be connected with a South African diamond company, is the lucky man who won Miss Morgan's hand.

The Impending Crisis

The thermometer has risen in Newport, for the Willie K. Vanderbilts, Sr., are about to return. Fashionable society has halted in the course of its dog-dinners and parrot and monkey diversions to contemplate the great social crisis. Everybody is on the tiptoe of expectancy, and the elite of the country is holding its breath in feverish anticipation, for it is generally understood that something will happen when Mrs. Vanderbilt that was and Mrs. Vanderbilt that is become rival hostesses in Newport. Mrs. Vanderbilt that was is now Mrs. "Ollie" Belmont, and she is one of the most active leaders of the ton. The present Mrs. Vanderbilt, it is believed, will undertake to round up a clique, and make things hum socially, right in the heart of the fashionable colony which her predecessor has long ruled. Hence the feverish anxiety of the elite. Hostilities will soon begin, and a battle-royal will be waged which will divert the attention of the country from all other happenings. The next session of Congress may be a lively one. Russia may seize Manchuria and another massacre may take place in Kishineff, but until the great social crisis in Newport is over the little burg on the Atlantic seaboard will be the centre of all that is interesting to the people of the nation. Watch the sunday supps and you will be kept informed about the various thrilling developments.

"Happy Jack" Is Free

Word comes to me from New York of the divorce of John A. Van Rensselaer, son of Mrs. John King Van Rensselaer, the novelist. The latter enjoyed quite a little newspaper notoriety not long since owing to a controversy with her aged aunt, Mrs. Hoyt, with whom she had been living in Newport. An advertisement appeared in a Newport paper that Mrs. Van Rensselaer had left and would not be permitted to return to Mrs. Hoyt's house, but the novelist said the ad. was spite work of a negro maid who had hypnotized her aunt. Mrs. Van Rensselaer's son, generally known as "Happy Jack" Van Rensselaer, did not marry in his mother's exclusive set, his bride being Helen Galindo, a Brooklyn girl who had beauty but lacked blue corpuscles. Their marriage occurred seven years ago and "Happy Jack" sank into social obscurity in Brooklyn, an obscurity from which he only emerged the other day when his divorce suit was instituted. The case was a "closed door" affair, and all that is known of it is that the wife was forbidden to remarry, though that privilege was not denied to "Happy Jack."

"Bob" Bien in America Again

A correspondent writes from Chicago that Mrs. Robert Bien and her husband passed through the windy city the other day on their way to visit the Pecks at their summer home at Oconomowoc. The Biens have, since their marriage, lived in Paris where they studied the vocal art under a famous master. Mrs. Bien, who as Arline Peck was regarded by the Chicago elite as haughty and unapproachable to the extreme, has become quite genial and bohemian in manner. There is little trace of the reserved, distant heiress of the Peck millions in the smiling, gay and vivacious Mrs. Bien. Paris is credited with this pleasing change in demeanor, but I think the young husband should have some of the medals. Bob Bien was ever a sanguine, bohemian nature, living in a haze of rose-colored dreams. He had a penchant for heiresses, and when he wedded the Chicago girl was said to be about half engaged if not wholly affianced to an Oakland heiress. In Chicago and Paris it is the popular delusion that Bien is a millionaire himself and that singing is merely a fad with him. He has serious ideas of a stage career and has imbued his young wife with the same ambition, so they may make their operatic debut together.

A Britisher's Impressions

It is always interesting to see ourselves as others see us. In London Modern Society there recently appeared a letter from an English woman sojourning in this city, and this is an excerpt:

The California girls are exquisite and have the real rose-leaf complexion, so beautiful while it lasts; but, unfortunately, it fades quite early, and when the bud has developed into the rose one can soon begin to watch for the petals to fade and droop; for, as a rule, young people lose their good looks at a very early age compared with our English lasses. It is quite flattering to notice the reverence they pay to the English, and in telling a girl here that she resembles an English girl she will "dimple" and blush with delight, and you will be her friend for ever; but this is the same all over the States. * * * In all my experience I have seen nothing to equal the extravagance of the average Californian; they seem to count the cost of nothing, and their lives are

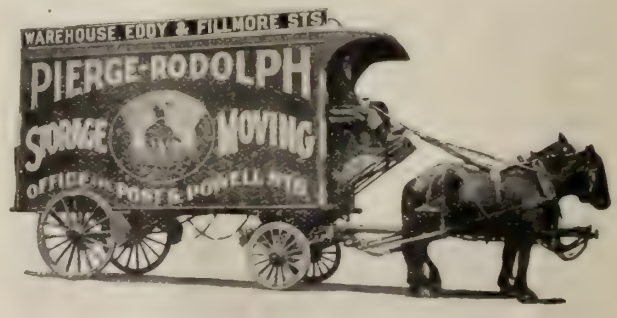
A Church Without a Rector

Trinity Episcopal church, which shelters one of the most fashionable congregations in San Jose, is without a rector and from present indications it will be some time before a man is secured to fill the pulpit. Trinity parish has been the seat of contention for more than a year. The parishioners are divided into two warring factions, and the dissensions have nearly resulted in disrupting the church. Three years ago Rev. Burr M. Weedon was rector and every one was pleased, but he resigned and accepted a call to St. Luke's Episcopal church, San Francisco, recommending Dr. C. H. Mockbridge of Toronto, Canada, as a man fully able to take his place. The congregation acted according to the Rev. Mr. Weedon's recommendations and Dr. Mockbridge became his successor. Not long after the latter's arrival he objected to a certain member of the vested choir and refused him communion on the grounds that he had been divorced. Clarence T. Urmy, organist, poet, social idol and leader of the choir, objected to Dr. Mockbridge's attitude toward the choir member and refused to permit the dismissal of the singer. Thereupon there was trouble and the congregation took sides. The more liberal ones agreed with Urmy and the more orthodox sympathized with the rector. Finally Urmy resigned, and then came the annual election of vestrymen, and both factions put tickets in the field. It was a contest to decide whether Dr. Mockbridge was to remain or whether he was to resign. The rector was defeated by about six votes. He immediately handed in his resignation and accepted a call to Buffalo. Since that time, six months ago, the church has been without a rector. The opposing factions are still very bitter and it is hard for the vestry to secure a man who is acceptable to all. Recently Rev. Ward Denys of Baltimore filled the pulpit on two Sundays and he was so universally liked that a call was extended to him. After weeks of waiting for an answer he refused. The vestry will now have to continue its search for another man.

Mrs. Mary W. George, one of the most popular educators of the San Jose State Normal School and Miss Calthea C. Vivian, the artist, who is connected with the same institution, have been granted a leave of absence for a year, during which time they will tour the world. Mrs. George sailed Saturday for the Hawaiian Islands where she will remain three weeks. Thence she will journey to Japan where she will join a large party of Californians who will tour Japan, China, India and Egypt. She will then go to Europe where she will meet Miss Vivian, who will start from San Jose in October. They will spend some time in study and travel throughout Europe. Mrs. George carries letters from Governor Pardee, Superintendent Kirk and other high officials, accrediting her to the educational institutions of the countries whose systems she wishes to investigate.



Why Ryland Resigned

There was consternation among San Jose politicians the other day when it was learned that Joseph R. Ryland had handed in his resignation as city school trustee without assigning any reason for the step. There were all sorts of conjectures as to the cause of the action. Ryland will not talk but it is well known that there has been much friction between him and Judge Lewis, the chairman of the Board, who is one of the spokesmen of the present administration. Ryland is one of Mayor Worswick's appointees and he took his seat as trustee after the old board were ousted a year ago. All went well until certain members of the new board proposed some very drastic measures to which Ryland seriously objected. Because of his liberal policy he had many tiffs with Judge Lewis. Matters came to a crisis during the annual classification of teachers. Certain members of the board proposed shifting many of the teachers. Ryland did not approve of this action, for he has always been the champion of the teachers. He tried to prevent the wholesale shift but he was in the minority, and finding that he could not remain on the board and work in harmony with Judge Lewis he retired. And now it is reported in San Jose that he is in training for the Mayoralty. He is a pretty big man in the Garden City. He has social and financial backing, and he has many friends in both the political factions of his party, and some say that he severed his connection with the Worswick administration so that he would be free to oppose Mayor Worswick in the next convention.

Her Thrilling Stunt

One of Stockton's popular society women, the wife of a physician, did an impromptu stunt of the flying ballet order the other day, and it proved highly diverting to the few privileged spectators to whom it came as a delightful surprise. She had stepped from her husband's office through a low window over a dry goods store, in pursuit of a kitten that had gone out on a balcony, and she returned through another window that opened on a floor which was being repaired. A crashing sound was heard and simultaneously business was suspended in the dry goods store while the pop-eyed clerks were lost in admiration of the dainty lingerie so bewitchingly exhibited from above. It was the most daringly original spectacle ever presented in the highly moral city of Stockton. For a time the enraptured clerks, spellbound by the dangling limbs encased in black lace hose, failed to realize that it was an involuntary exhibition, but the screams of the physician's wife soon aroused them to the danger of her position and then she was promptly rescued. An unsympathetic female clerk was so moved by the humor of the situation that she went into hysterics. The physician's wife was slightly bruised, but it has been suggested that there should be some consolation in the consciousness of the fact that she at least made a a good showing.

Engagement of a Stockton Belle

When the engagement of Miss Clara Rosenbaum of Stockton and Mr. Karl Triest of Los Angeles was announced last week, the tabbies of the gateway city uttered a fervent "At last." Miss Rosenbaum is the oldest daughter of D. E. Rosenbaum, a prominent banker and merchant of Stockton, and she has been out several seasons, but the tabbies needn't have given themselves any concern on that account. The three Rosenbaum girls are pretty, accomplished, womanly and modest to an unusual degree, and they have not been eager to fall into the arms of the first man that came a-wooing. One of Stockton's very popular and prosperous young business men is so attentive to another of the Rosenbaum girls that the gossips are wondering whether another engagement will soon be announced. It is thought probable, however, that race and religious differences will prove an insurmountable obstacle, notwithstanding the fact that the fathers of the young people are partners.

Mrs. Ashton Potter will stay with her people here until after the stork's visit, when she will join her husband in Manila.

Service Gossip

There is to be a new Chief Quartermaster of the Department of California. Colonel S. W. Patten, who has been on duty in the Quartermaster General's office in Washington, D. C., will succeed Lieutenant Colonel John McE. Hyde, who has been ordered to St. Paul's and is expected to arrive here next month. The Tenth Infantry is expected here shortly to take station at the Presidio and will probably be here for a long term of service.

Captain White is the new quartermaster at the Presidio, relieving Captain Stanley who has held the post since the departure of Captain Kimball for the Philippines. Among the army officers who have been in San Francisco this week is Captain Pershing, Fifteenth Cavalry, who arrived by the steamer Siberia last week, on leave of absence. Captain Pershing performed some heroic deeds in Mindanao and has been selected as one of the officers of the general staff. General Burton, who is now Inspector General, was here this week. Major Devol is on duty at headquarters in charge of the office of the chief quartermaster of this Department, having relieved Colonel Hyde.

There was a pleasant little dance given by the enlisted men at Fort Baker last Tuesday night, the first ever given at that post, the guests going over by the army tug McDowell, returning to town at midnight. The reception given by the officers at the Presidio on Wednesday night in honor of General George B. Rodney on his retirement from the service was a brilliant affair. All the posts around the city were represented and many guests from town were also present.

When Dumb Things Speak

HIS COLLECTION.

First Photo (showing a voluptuous brunette in full fleshings): I wonder why we were all hustled so unceremoniously from his bureau?

Second Photo (of a blonde, delicate and spirituelle looking, in a shirt waist and golf skirt): Easy enough to answer. He's going to be married, and she's coming to call today with her mother and cousins and have tea.

First Photo: How do you know?

Second Photo: Because I've been hustled down before. You see, this isn't my first experience. I have been given to several men before—and been returned when the engagement was off.

First Photo: Nobody ever returned me.

Second Photo: Didn't consider it worth while, perhaps. You are, judging from your—ah, costume, a public character.

First Photo: A star. I was the twenty-thousand dollar prize beauty. I remember when she gave me to him. He was a boy at college and he adored her—mercy me! how he adored her. She had me taken specially for him, when she was playing in "The Silver Slipper." She was the Prince. It cost his father a pretty penny to cut the Prince loose from the college boy. But he still keeps me. He was looking at me the other night and I heard him say, "Who the deuce are you?"

Third Photo (of a girl with fluffy hair, in short skirts and heelless slippers): He said that same thing to me. Yet I remember when she gave me to him—he loved her. At least he spent heaps and heaps of money on her.

Second Photo: I don't believe he remembers me exactly. It strikes me he stared at me a long time when he took me down the other day. But then I am only the picture of a summer girl.

Fourth Photo (of a statuesque beauty, Gibson pose): I am the picture of the only girl he ever loved. Many times he told her that—and she believed him. A pity she could not be here to see how her portrait is treated.

The Others: Is she dead?

Fourth Photo: Not a bit of it. Married a pork packer and has five children.

The Others: Did she jilt him?

Fourth Photo: I don't know exactly. But the father proved to her that he was carrying on with her chum at the same time he was engaged to her, and somehow the affair was broken off.

Fifth Photo (of a stout blonde in mannish clothes): I'm the chum. He loved me all the time. For the girl who sat for me was really the only girl he ever loved.

Six Photographs—of a slim, large-eyed girl in a sweater and carrying a racquet, a short girl with a beautiful neck revealed in a decollete evening frock, a pretty woman in sealskin sack and picture hat, a woman of thirty (or over) in the costume of Ophelia, a petite, chic French woman in the act of doing a pas seul, and a college girl in a mortar-board and gown, all speak at once: Nonsense! I am the portrait of the only girl he ever really loved.

First Photo: What's that frame doing on the mantel?

Second Photo: Oh, I presume that's she—the one who's coming with mamma. And that one on the bureau is his sister, taken with their father and mother.

[Enter the owner of room, with a tall girl in a shirt-waist suit, followed by another girl and an elderly matron.]

First Girl: Oh, what a sweet place! But what are all those pictures on the table? (examining photos).

The Man (carelessly): Oh, those belong to my late roommate. My man's going to pack 'em this afternoon and send them to him.

She: I'm so glad you have nothing but my picture on your mantel.

He (softly): But that's right, dear. Aren't you the only girl I ever loved?

[Rustling as of laughter or anger among photos on table.]

HER COLLECTION.

First Photo (showing a boy with freckles and hair that was probably red): I'm sure I felt a tear drop on me, as she consigned me to the bottom of this old trunk. "Dear old Fred," she said, "didn't we have nice times when we went to the academy?" I'm sure she kissed me.

Second Photo (of a slim, distinguished-looking foreigner): I've no doubt she did. She kissed me. I was her drawing-master's picture. She is full of sentiment. She used to write notes to him at school, and put pressed flowers in them. He gave her this portrait—also gave all the other drawing-pupils one. They were all soft on him. He was married, and brought his wife out after he had taught a few months.

Third Photo: She was engaged to my original for two weeks. It was when she went to college. They quarreled at a dance, but she never sent me back with the ring. She was looking at me last night and said, "What a little fool I was at eighteen."

Fourth Photo (of a man of forty-five, solid and businesslike in appearance): She made lots of jokes about me to her cousin as she packed me in the trunk. I was given her by the man her parents picked out for her—an old family friend. But she teased him to death and wouldn't consider the match.

First Photo: Did he die of a broken heart?

Fourth Photo: No—married her aunt, a well-preserved widow of his own age, with three children.

Fifth Photo (of a handsome actor in the costume of Romeo): She had an awful crush on my original. She bought me at a gallery and then sent me to the actor to get his autograph. She used to send flowers, too, and notes.

A score of photos, all of handsome actors, speak simultaneously: Me, too. She must have spent all her pin-money on my original.

Sixth Photo (of prize fighter in light costume): Ah, but when she fell in love with him all the actors' photos were banished from her bureau. She never sent him flowers but she bought his picture, and made a scrap-book of clippings all about him. She took physical culture lessons of him for a whole month.

Seventh Photo (of a jockey in blouse and cap): Until she took a fancy to my original. She never missed a day at the races for a week, and always bet on his mount.

Eighth Photo (of a clubman): She liked my original pretty well, but he displeased her by forcing his suit and so he had to go.

Ninth Photo (of a German army officer in uniform): He loved her, but she fancied it was her money he was after. They exchanged photos at the end, and promised to be friends forever.

First Photo: How she sits and gazes at that portrait on her bureau—that broad-shouldered chap without much beauty but with a pleasant face. Who is he?

The Others: He is the only man she ever loved.

[Some time after their marriage she is unpacking one of her trunks, and throws out the bunch of photographs.]

He: Who are all those fellows, dear?

She (blushing and laughing): Oh, you know I used to fall in love with every actor I saw. I never met any of them, you know. What a silly girl I was. (Takes up first photo.) Oh, this one is of a dear boy I liked so much (drops a tear). He died in his first battle. I never cared for any of the others. I am so glad, dear, that I never did. You are really and truly the only man I ever loved. (Kisses him.) And, tell me, darling, I am really and truly the only girl you ever loved?

He: Yes, darling, really and truly, honor bright, the only woman I ever loved. —The Sentimentalist.

How Principles Are Abandoned

Editor Town Talk:

Having discussed Bryan's personality, permit me now to outline what has been the attitude of both great political parties of this State upon the money question, not by way of advocacy of either side but just to relate a little interesting political history that many people appear to have forgotten.

Our State Legislature by a practically unanimous vote instructed its Senators and requested its Representatives in Congress to vote for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Following closely upon the passage of this resolution the Republican State Convention met and named its delegates to the St. Louis Convention, which subsequently nominated McKinley. These delegates were instructed to vote for a free silver platform, and a free silver candidate. The delegation started in a special Pullman train decorated with free silver banners; they tipped the porter with silver dollars, smoked silver branded cigars, and many of them were so infatuated with their job that they showed their fealty by refusing to drink anything save silver gin fizzes. The departure of this band of Republican patriots was a sight to behold, and one long to be remembered. The delegation, the flower of the Republican party, started out to convert their Eastern brethren to the silver idea, and vowed that they would die rather than dishonor their constituents or violate their instructions. The delegation consisted of the leaders of the Republican party of this State; its orators, its editors, its practical politicians and its place-hunters. The train sped on its way Eastward, through the various towns and cities, to the inspiring strains of silver bands directed by silver-clothed drum majors. Never before in the history of this State did a more distinguished delegation leave it to make the politicians of the East feel the effect of a unanimous Western sentiment on the silver question. But when the delegation reached the Eastern slope of the Rockies a change come o'er the spirit of their dreams. They heard a still small voice. It was the voice of Marcus Aurelius Hanna, the man who obtained a seat in the Senate by the most open and notorious corruption. The metallic touch of his hand had a soothing effect on the delegation from this State, and the result was that these statesmen sacrificed their manhood and violated their instructions, and yet returned home to receive the plaudits of the Republican party of California. Does it not go to prove that the Republican party is willing to adopt any policy, advocate any principle, to continue in power? Mr. John P. Young, the able editor of the Chronicle, is the author of one of the ablest free silver arguments ever written by a Californian and the paper whose editorial columns he controls is at present engaged in an effort to destroy the effect of what were, supposedly, his free and unfettered opinions.

Hon. M. M. Estee, twice the nominee of his party for Governor of this State, several years ago delivered a most masterly address favoring the free and unlimited coinage of silver. It was pronounced at the time a masterpiece of argument, but subsequently denounced as the very essence of demagoguery. Estee made one speech in that campaign, and to his credit be it said he adhered to the doctrines he had formerly preached, and for the offense of consistency he was not again permitted to address his Republican fellow citizens.

The Democratic convention of 1896 was a free silver convention by more than a two-thirds vote. The money powers of the East failed to control it, and the New York delegation returned home and knifed the ticket. And yet those people and others like them are now claiming to be the representatives of true democracy. Their efforts are deceiving nobody, for the great body of the democracy are true and honest; they stand by honest leaders, and are faithful to true democratic principles.

A Jeffersonian Democrat.

Cuckoo

A fool there was and he loved his booze
And his lemans fair and frail.
But he drew the line if he had to choose
'Twixt them and the altar rail.
'Twixt them and the altar rail, Cuckoo!
And the ring and the wedding bell;
So he loved and he laughed as his cup he quaffed
On the slippery road to hell.

All unbeguiled he serenely smiled,
Or laughed at the siren's snare;
While the "unco guid" and the undefiled
Were blind to the deadfall there.
Were blind to the deadfall there, Cuckoo!!
As for home, sweet home, they yearned
On some snowy breast that the fool had pressed,
Then away from it lightly turned.

This fool had learnt to draw the line,
I've already said above;
For the wife and the wanton should ne'er combine,
So he clung to the lighter love.
So he clung to the lighter love, Cuckoo!!!
And the broad and the rosy road;
Though his feet were thorned, he was never "horned,"
For he kept to his careless code.

August, 1903. Louis A. Robertson.

A Summer Night Silhouette

Dark, shadowy leaves against a starlit sky,
A breeze that loiters, then goes floating by,
A terraced lawn, a low, white-columned porch,
Sweet Venus burning like a heavenly torch,
A spray of jessamine trembling in the light,
Two dark eyes lifted to the summer night.

A swift, firm step, the glow of a cigar,
Come up the path to where the dark eyes are,
Two white hands nestle in strong hands of brown,
Two eyes flash up and two look deeply down,
A whispered word, "Sweetheart," in love's dear tone—
Let's say, "Good-night," and leave them there alone.
—They won't care!

Automobile Topics

The members of the Automobile Club started on their trip to Monterey last Thursday afternoon. Friday morning they were joined by members of the San Jose and Alameda clubs and made the run from the Vendome to Salinas where they had lunch, after which they resumed their journey to Del Monte. Today the auto enthusiasts are witnessing the polo games and tomorrow they will take the Seventeen Mile drive. Never before was there such a large gathering of automobiles on this coast.

The benighted officials of Marin county are still intent upon discouraging the use of the motor car in their little villages. Marin county has the distinction of being the only place in the United States where people do not recognize that restrictions should not be placed recklessly on a great sport and a great industry. In all parts of this county laws designed to harass the motor car have been enacted, and the highest officials in some of the most densely populated States are eager for the establishment of sound working principles upon which may be based regulations for making the roads safe for pedestrians and drivers without unnecessarily restricting the rights of the chauffeur. From all the subjects of legislation to which motor vehicles contribute none is of more importance than that of speed. The public will not be content to observe specified rates of speed under specified conditions, but as automobile advance and motor all conditions be it is found to control the vehicle to such a degree as to secure the safety of the road for any other person who may be traveling upon it. Those who hold this radical proposition, which does away with a speed limit, recommend that the law of the moving case as does engine was quickly passing away, and that the ordinary rate of speed could be established without a hard and fast rule. It is about time the prejudice against the automobile is living are overcome and that common sense is getting the better of the public prejudice.

Mr. A. W. Spaulding, Miss Spaulding and Mrs. Robert Oxnard took a run to San Jose last week and registered at the Vendome, which appears to be the headquarters for all automobilists.

The first heat of the international cup race in 1900 comes as the result of an affair on the part of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin to protect the owners in the yacht if the Prussian authorities should refuse to allow it.

R. B. Sprague of Menlo Park has a handsome automobile. With Mrs. Sprague he is often seen touring the county road between Menlo and San Jose.

The American Motor League, which is composed by all the members of the League of American Wheelmen, is continuing its work in the sphere of influence by the adoption of many of the methods which made the latter league such a power in the land. The first national book used is to be issued by the touring department and will contain 200 pages and will be illustrated with maps and blue prints. The work is being compiled with a view to the greatest possible accuracy, and will be issued in two parts, the first containing the routes in the Eastern and Middle States, and the second those in the Western and Southern States. Each number will consist of over fifty pages, and will be issued in loose-leaf form, so that the subscriber may have the privilege of adding to the number of routes as he may desire. The publication will be issued in the early spring, and will be sold at a price which will be within the reach of all. Those who are interested in touring should send their names and addresses to the secretary of the League of American Wheelmen, Boston, Mass., and they will be supplied with a circular containing full information regarding the publication.

The Automobile Club of California has issued a call for a meeting to be held at the Palace Hotel on Wednesday evening, May 15th, at which time the question of the proposed automobile contest to Yosemite will be discussed. It is probable that the contest will be held some time in June, and it is expected that a large number of machines will participate. The Automobile Club of California has been active in the matter of securing a good road to the Yosemite, and it is probable that the contest will be held over the route which has been selected by the club.

"Ha!" exclaimed the villain, "at last you are in my power. There is no escape."

But the sad-eyed victim gave not the slightest indication of reproachful.

The fact is the play was so rotten he couldn't enter into the spirit of it. Besides, he was a bad actor and couldn't be emotional if he tried.

STAGE

Kendall in Rural Drama

Ezra Kendall is too good an artist to waste his time in such an insipid play as "The Vinegar Buyer." Kendall was known for many years as one of the most amusing and intelligent of the monologue artists of the vaudeville stage. He possesses a quaint individuality that is distinctly reminiscent of Sol Smith Russell, and that should be worth exploiting in plays similar to those in which that very successful actor starred. Liebler & Co., the managers of "The Vinegar Buyer Company," probably had some such notion when they engaged Kendall to star for them, but they placed too much reliance on the magnetism of the erstwhile vaudeville artist. They had a play written for him, but it is a very feeble effort in the rural drama line. It has some atmosphere, a great deal of Kendall and very little else. Twenty minutes of Kendall in vaudeville is very different from two and a half hours of Kendall in an unsubstantial rural drama. His Yankee twang and his whimsicalities of speech and manner are intensely amusing, but they grow monotonous when there is so little pretext for them as Herbert Hall Winslow's play affords. The humor of the play is of the infantile order, and is highly suggestive of the comic page of a Sunday supp.

Helen— or as she used to be known, Lena—Salinger is not a stranger to San Francisco. She used to sing at the Tivoli in the days when her sister Tillie was prima donna—plump Tillie, who married Phil Branson, the "all round" member of the company. Lena was slimmer than her sister and not less fascinating than the prima donna but she is stouter now. Young Dr. Charlie Griswold became her shadow, and at one time their engagement was reported. But Lena went East instead and then Northwest, whence rumors of her marriage with a wealthy man were wafted to California. Another member of Ezra Kendall's company who is no stranger to us is Lucille La Verne, who was leading lady at the Grand for two seasons, at the time Coulter Brincker was leading man. Miss La Verne is a Southern girl.

"Zorah" has many features in common with "Resurrection" though it is in no sense an imitation of the Tolstoi drama in plot or situation. But there is a Russian background, and the mines of Siberia figure in the scenes. Herschel Mayall is the Rabbi Israel Francos, the persecuted hero, and Henry Shumer revels in the role of the cruel Governor of Moscow. Miss Lawton, Edwin Emery, John T. Hines, Millar Bacon and Grace Stoddard have the other principal parts. The play is beautifully staged. The Central in its present stock season is giving some noteworthy productions. Special preparations are under way for the presentation of "Cumberland 61" for G. A. R. week.

The character of Janice Meredith fitted Mary Mannering well, for Janice of the novel from which the play was built is a frivolous little schoolgirl, just as Miss Mannering portrayed her. But Lillian Kemble at the California gives a Janice who is much more lovable than the one we saw at the Columbia. Under all the lightness and frivolity one sees the depths of patriotism and affection that lie beneath. In the famous toast scene, Miss Kemble arouses her audience to intense enthusiasm.

Preparations for the production of the impressive allegorical play, "Everyman," in this city have been completed, and I predict that it will create as great a sensation as it did in New York two years ago. This fifteenth century play was revived by the Elizabethan Stage Society of England, which has been responsible for many notable revivals, and for the presentation of many plays of high literary merit that would otherwise never have been produced. The society is composed of many of the most distinguished literary and art-loving people of England. The company that presented "Everyman" in New York was one that had toured the

The Punishment

Ben Omi stood, with drooping head,
To hear the final judgment read
By him who kept the record;
The accusations 'neath his name
Recounted deeds for serious blame—
A thumb-marked page and checkered.

"Your sins are great," the angel cried,
"I know of none who ever died
So quite unfit for glory;
No punishment that e'er was writ
Could shrive your soul and make it fit
For even purgatory.

"And yet—methinks I'll improvise
And make a penalty, unwise,
But most intensely human;
'Tis this: Go back to earth and men,
Resume the flesh, be born again,
And be, this time, a woman!"

provinces of England, but the people who are now en route to this city come direct from London where they played under the auspices of the society. The management never publishes the names of the mummers, not even on the program, but they are professional people and those that appeared in New York created such a sensation that the audiences insisted upon learning the identity of the anonymous players, and in time the newspapers published them. The play is produced without scenery and the action takes one hour and forty minutes and is continuous. It is a most impressive play, exploiting as it does the reluctance of man to meet his Creator. It opens in heaven where God, looking down upon the sinful earth, perceives how Everyman "Lyveth after his own pleasure," as if ignoring the uncertainty of human life. He calls upon Death to summon him to undertake a pilgrimage, and bring with him a sure reckoning. When summoned Everyman in terror tries to persuade his friends, Fellowship, Kindred, Wealth, Beauty, Strength and Discretion to accompany him but all refuse.

In the canyon near Alum Rock park, San Jose, there is a little camp which is rather unique, not because of its natural surroundings, but because of the people who occupy it. It is called Camp Blunkal, after Erwin Blunkal, the actor. Blunkal's companions in the camp are his wife, Lillian Atwood, Edna Elsmere, Emory Blunkal and Charles Verner, the Irish comedian. Others have come and gone, including Norval McGregor, and Richard Scott and wife. Here, far away from everything which in any way brings back memories of the tiresome life on the stage, they have enjoyed themselves for two months away from the rustle and bustle of the world.

Madame Konorah still leads in interesting the Orpheum audiences. Her mathematical stunt is truly marvelous, and her mind-reading power is shown in the way she calls off figures written by members of the audience. Roberts, Hayes and Roberts have an amusing sketch in "The Infant"—the infant being a giant of seven feet or thereabouts and the fun rather running to horse-play. Morton's monologue contains some novelties and appeals to those who enjoy the jesting of "The Infant" troupe. The biograph is still in business and reels off several new pictures.

Good Fortune Coming Her Way

In Carroll McComas all the hopes of an ambitious mother promise to be realized. Of the four McComas girls whom their mother labored to place in prominent places in the world, Carroll is the only one whose star has continually kept in the ascendancy. Mrs. Alice Beach McComas, after her husband, Judge McComas, was fixed in a good position in Los Angeles in the practice of his profession some years ago, turned her ambitions toward her daughters. She earned a deal of money herself in different business ventures and in literature, and this she spent chiefly in making her four girls the possessors of accomplishments that would help them toward independent careers. But one of the girls fell a victim to burns that caused her death. Alice, the third daughter and a charming girl, studied piano under William Piutti and showed considerable talent as a pianist, but was hampered by lameness and delicacy of constitution, which prevented her from winning distinction. Then Claire, the beauty of the family, eloped with a man named Binford, and followed this with another elopement with magnetic healer Harris. She claimed to have been hypnotized by the healer and when her parents finally rescued her in Arizona she was a wreck from nervous prostration. Mrs. McComas was undaunted by all these setbacks of unkind fate, and centered her ambitions on her youngest daughter, little Carroll. The girl was a fine whistler and after appearing at small affairs and exploiting her talent as a siffleuse she obtained an engagement on the Orpheum circuit. Of attractive appearance and winning way she was successful all along the line. And now, having developed remarkable dramatic talent, an Eastern manager has engaged her to support Jerome Sykes in his new comedy next season. Carroll McComas is only seventeen years old, and her career looks very promising.

The New Tivoli

Rush work has been done on the old panorama building at Eddy and Mason streets, to fit it for the home of opera under the title of the new Tivoli Opera House. It is expected to be ready on September fifteenth or thereabouts, and the old Tivoli will be converted into an office building. The old panorama building is admirably adapted for an opera house. With its circular form and two galleries it has quite a continental air. One of the features of the improvements will be an open cafe on the top floor. The building will be heated throughout with hot water and ventilated after the newest force-draft system. Grand opera will be the initial attraction of the new Tivoli. In the meantime preparations are being made at the old Tivoli for a new comic opera production. Anna Lichter has been engaged for the principal soprano part and will come on from New York shortly to begin rehearsals in "The Fortune Teller."

Rosalind in the Fog

"As You Like It" in the open air is delightful—sometimes—but not within sound of the barking seals where the ocean breezes blow, and the humid fog-banks softly nestle. Nance O'Neil is a pleasing Rosalind and Mr. Ratcliff's Orlando is well balanced but they cannot make you forget the temperature on Sutro Heights on a cold night. Nance O'Neil's Rosalind is coquettish and subtle, and the touch of humor is delicious, but it is not poetic. There is a freshness of conception in the role but it does not warm the atmosphere on the chilly Cliff. It is full of grace but it doesn't harmonize with the fog. It is captivating and intelligent, but it does not stay the shivers when the air is laden with moisture. Even though it were the very Rosalind of the rhymes that decorate the trees, I should not care to pay Miss O'Neil the homage of another visit to Sutro Heights on a cold, foggy day to sit through a performance and invite an attack of pneumonia. Much as I admire her as an actress, she cannot lure me again to the frigid zone near the haunts of the musical seals.

"Teddy" was Poet Henley's Brother

"Personal power mixed with crass violence," are the terms used in the current Collier's in telling a story about the late E. J. Henley, in connection with the recent death of his brother, the biographer of Robert Louis Stevenson. The brothers are said, in this article, to have had the traits of personal magnetism, talent and ruffianism in common. An American actress related how Henley the actor once forgot his lines and placed her in an awkward predicament. He entered late and ran off a string of meaningless sentences instead of the lines necessary to bring out the story in the scene. When they reached the wings the actress angrily exclaimed:

"How dare you come here drunk, forget your lines and disgrace yourself, the audience and me?"

Henley laughed carelessly:

"Oh, listen to them," he answered.

The audience was applauding uproariously, having been enchained by the actor's magnetism though understanding none of the import of his lines.

His First Play

Mrs. "Dave" Belasco is visiting her relatives in this city, and her husband is expected to join the family shortly. David Belasco is one of the most successful San Franciscans that ever left home to carve a career. His brothers, too, have had more than a short measure of success and the Belasco star shines brightly on both sides of the continent. Dave Belasco's first play was "The Curse of Cain," written in collaboration with Peter Robertson, and was produced at the Baldwin of which the former was then stage manager. A farmyard in the first act was stocked with real sheep, ducks, pigs and geese and the audience lost sight of the play in watching the amusing migrations of the live stock. Thus even at that time Belasco showed his genius in diverting the attention of an audience from an attenuated plot. Realism cleverly disguised in sentiment has been a feature of his stage hits ever since.

One Night to Mourn

The man in the box-office has some droll experiences. To the treasurer of the Alcazar, Edward Belasco, there appealed the other evening a violently agitated woman of middle age, in hastily improvised mourning attire, whose eyes were swollen with weeping.

"I have two seats for tonight," she explained, in a voice choked with emotion, "but there's been a sudden death in our family and I want to change them for tomorrow night."

The treasurer wiped away a sympathetic tear, sighed heavily and obliged the lady.

Theo. T. Rook, Tony West, Helen Hartley and other people engaged by Belasco and Mayer for "The Dairy Farm," in which they played distinctive characters more than one thousand times in the East, arrived from New York this week.

The Alcazar is making unusual preparations for "The Dairy Farm," a rural play that had enormous success in the East, where it played one hundred and fifty-four consecutive weeks without closing. After the Alcazar presentation, August seventeenth, it will be sent out for an extensive tour by Belasco and Mayer, with an important cast, including several players identified with the Eastern success. ingenue, becomes restive about every so often and sighs for New York conquests. She had quite made up her mind to invade Broadway next month, but the soubrette part of Minty in "The Dairy Farm" is so enticing that she has signed to play it for the season. An artful management thus adroitly gratifies her ambition and her desire for travel. "The Dairy Farm," by the way, has never been seen west of Denver.

Dr. McIvor-Tyndall Attracting Large Audiences

Is telepathy intensified vibrations of electricity? The idea is quite probable, in view of the surprising discoveries of materialistic science. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall in his lecture last Sunday night gave it as his unqualified opinion that all force is from the same source, whether it be manifested as heat, light, motion, or telepathy. Tyndall has been demonstrating his theory for many years, and naturally has collected many wonderful instances of telepathic communication. These, together with his own deductions formed the basis of his lecture, which was announced as "Telepathy: Is It a Lost Faculty or a Development?" The lecture attracted a very large audience of thoughtful, critical hearers, and they were not disappointed. Tyndall always has something worth saying, and he says it remarkably well, entertaining as well as instructing. The demonstrations given were of an unusually intricate character. Tomorrow night the lecture will be on "The Power of Persuasion," when examples will be given of the force called mesmeric. The Sunday following, August sixteenth, the lecture will be "The Mastery of Fate."

If Wilton Lackaye had not elected to become an actor he would probably long since have been helping the country make laws in Congress. He is a strong Democrat and was one of the most enthusiastic supporters of William Jennings Bryan in the free silver campaign.

"The Red Mouse," which Eleanor Robson is to appear in next season according to the despatches, was originally intended for Mrs. Leslie Carter. David Belasco wrote it in collaboration with Harry Dam.

Virginia Harned in "Iris," and "The Prince of Pilsen" are Columbia futures.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"The Big Little Princess," which Fischer's will put on Monday night is a good-natured satire upon Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's "kid" play, "The Little Princess," adapted from "Sarah Crewe, or What Happened at Miss Minchin's," a short tale for children which followed "Little Lord Fauntleroy." All the episodes and situations of the book and play have been caricatured by Edgar Smith; and to his lyrics W. E. Francis has written some charming melodies. "Quo Vass Iss" is a genial josh by Edgar Smith on "Quo Vadis" which has been seen many times in this city. The music is some of the best of the lamented composer, John Stromberg. The army, the police, the nurse-maids, the Roman Temperance Ladies' Union, the frightened lion, and the sports of the arena are all shown in a jocular way. All the favorites will be in the cast, including Helene Montrose, Gertie Emerson and Flossie Hope. Among the songs new to San Francisco are "Etiquette" by Winfield Blake, "De Bugaboo Man" by Maude Amber, "There's nobody just like you" by Eleanor Jenkins, "Mrs. Pinchin's Boarding School" by Barney Bernard, and "You am de One" by Hope and Emerson. "The Corn Curers," the very funny travesty on "The Conquerors," is slated for an early production at Fischer's. It is one of Weber & Field's best.

"In Harvard" will be produced at the Grand on a scale of magnificence unsurpassed. This latest of the Rogers Brothers' skits shows the Claremont gardens in New York, the college campus on class day, and the Eden Musee. Some new people have been added to this clever company—William L. Gleason, character actor, Robert Warwick, light comedian, Winifred Gordon and Julie Cotte, the latter a belle of our French colony before she made her debut as a singer at the Tivoli. Among the specialties will be a convention on the campus, the universities represented including California and Stanford; a new "Rube" song; a Japanese serenade sung by Cheridah Simpson; Anna Wilks and the Esmeralda sisters in a new song and dance, "My Palm Leaf Maid"; Miss Wilks and Ross in "My Red Carnation"; Louise Moore in "Mary, Mary Quite Contrary" and "Rainbows Follow After Rain"; Crane in a new coster song and Warwick in an anglomaniac topical.

"The Vinegar Buyer" enters upon its second and last week at the Columbia, Ezra Kendall's engagement ending with the performance on Sunday night, August sixteenth. The Miller-Anglin season will begin August seventeenth with "The Devil's Disciple," by George Bernard Shaw. Over a hundred people are required in this production.

Annie Russell's pretty comedy by Captain Marshall, "A Royal Family," will be the California's bill. Lilian Kemble will be the Princess, Mac Vicars the Cardinal, Frederic Sumner the lover and Phosa McAllister will have the Mrs. Gilbert role of the dowager Queen. "Shenandoah" comes next for Grand Army week.

"The Three Musketeers" will show White Whittlesey in a Salvini role, and again demonstrate his remarkable versatility. This will be the farewell week of Whittlesey at the Alcazar. He is to go East to support Nat Goodwin in the latter's revival of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Florence Roberts's season will follow "The Dairy Farm," the next attraction.

The Tivoli can't take "The Highwayman" off yet. Camille D'Arville is still the bright particular star but Stevens, Cunningham and Hartman are also shining lights of the production.

"Man's Enemy," described as "a moral sermon in action," will be the Central's bill. It describes the gaming mania and one of the scenes is at Monte Carlo. There will be fine scenery and a strong cast.

Elfie Fay, a clever eccentric comedienne, headlines the Orpheum's bill. She was a musical and farce comedy star for several seasons and is now one of the brilliant stars of the vaudeville circuit. Lew Hawkins, the "Chesterfield of minstrelsy," will pay his annual visit to San Francisco with new parodies and yarns. Sidney Wilmer and company have an amusing sketch, "A Thief in the Night." Mrs. Wynne Winslow, a beauty and a soprano of note, will have some fine songs. The clever trick bicyclists, the Kaufmanns, and Dooley and Tenbrooke will be among the holdovers.

At the Chutes will be the Campbell brothers, clever club jugglers and bag punchers, Loa Durbyelle in shadowgraph pictures, Little Blossom, the charming coon shouter, Hank Whitcomb in his bird and beast imitations, Hathaway and Walton, Lester and Curtin. —The Playgoer.

The Sportsman's Mecca

August, September, October and November are really the enjoyable months to spend in the country, and in no place is this more so than along the California Northwestern Railway.

It is a time when the crops one after another are ripening, from the fruits to grapes and hops. Nature is maturing and the climatic conditions are in unison.

During this time the fish are more readily caught and they are plentiful. Trout in the streams and trout and bass in the rivers and lakes.

The game has been well protected throughout this section and deer are easily found. In Marin county the open season for deer is from July 15th to September 15th; in Sonoma county until September 1st, and in Mendocino and Lake counties until October 1st. The dove season is open from July 15th to February 15th.

Many catches of fish are being daily made, and the hunter with the deer on his shoulders comes in every evening tired and hungry but proud.

This whole county is a Mecca for the sportsman. If he has not selected a location where he can board during his hunt the same will be readily found in "Vacation 1903," issued by the California Northwestern Railway.

The Bayreuth Opera

Great interest is being taken in the production of "Parsifal" in New York next season. Heinrich Conreid, the director of the Metropolitan Opera House, is being viciously attacked in Europe for daring to produce the Bayreuth play against the wishes of the widow of the dead composer. Conreid defends himself by saying that he will produce it as an act of reverence toward the great musical master. Owing to the absence of a copyright treaty between the United States and Germany, its production is open to any small manager who might have taken the piece on a tour and made a parody of it. For the production of "Parsifal" Conreid is spending sixty-five thousand dollars for alterations of the stage, and he is also paying Lautenschlager of Munich, the celebrated inventor of the revolving stage, a large sum to go to New York. The costumes and decorations will cost thirty thousand dollars, and artists have been engaged who will breathe life into the play. Contracts for "Parsifal" have been made with Van Rooy, Amfortas, Termina and Kundry. Felix Mottl and Hery of Breslau have been engaged to direct the orchestra of one hundred pieces. The pay of the artists will amount to eight thousand dollars a night. If all the seats were sold they would bring in ninety-seven hundred. There is therefore no question of money-grabbing as the critics have charged. The first performance will be given on December twenty-first. "Parsifal" will be given in New York only, and there not more than ten times. Conreid has also engaged Caruso, Kraus, Naval, Dippel, Scotti, Calve, Sembrich, Gadski and Schumann-Heink.

A Concert Twenty-eight Years Ago

In an old musical monthly I find a report of a concert given in 1875 by the Bohemian Club in aid of the sufferers in a Virginia City fire, from which this is an extract:

"The chorus was composed of the members of the Bohemian Club, comprising the leading musical talent in the city; and the glee "The Winds Whistle Cold," and Mr. Leach's "Waltz for Voices" called forth tumultuous applause. The Amphion Quartette, comprising Messrs. Jos. Maguire, J. E. Tippett, W. C. Campbell and J. Stadfeldt, rendered "The Blue Danube" with fine effect; and the two first-named gentlemen and Mr. C. W. Dungan gave sparkling solos which were favorably received. Mr. Maguire's musical friends thought he sang with even more than his accustomed vigor, and the audience would not be satisfied till he responded with "Sally in our Alley." Mr. and Mrs. A. Kelleher gave a superb duet, and the latter a song, which was encored. The flageolet solo of Mr. Richard Koehler was a model of brilliant execution, and has never been surpassed on this coast. Mr. Ernest Schlott and his associates gave a melodious quartette on the French Horn, which was a great attraction. Messrs. Evans, Bush and Hinrichs executed an elegant trio on piano, violin and cello. Mrs. Judah appeared in the readings, "Over the Hill to the Poor House" and "Return," with that distinctness and beauty of utterance for which she is noted. Mr. Henry Edwards recited the poem "Curfew Must not Toll Tonight," with a dramatic intensity that thrilled every heart; "And Then," Mr. Geo. T. Bromley made a speech."

Many of those who took part in that benefit are still living in San Francisco; others moved on to wider fields and others long since passed away. Mr. Tippett lives in Boston. Mr. Campbell was for years basso in the Calvary Presbyterian choir. The Kellehers are still prominent in the music world, though Mrs. Kelleher (Susan Galton) never sings in public now.

May Irwin was asked the other day what kind of songs she prefers. She answered: "The kind that best please an audience; good topicals with up-to-date hits, or a song which cleverly hits off the fads and weaknesses of human nature, or a quaint negro melody. The melody is the main thing."

LETTERS

The President's Opinion

Munsey's is coming down rather heavily on the President because of his commendation of books. "The kindly Mr. Howells must look to his laurels as the discoverer and encourager of budding genius if the energetic Mr. Roosevelt keeps on in his career of unofficial literary patronage." The trouble about the presidential patronage is that if Mr. Roosevelt inadvertently remarks in the hearing of any one outside of his immediate family circle that he has enjoyed a book or any incident in a book, the remark is immediately caught up and made the most of. It is given the newspapers, forwarded to the publisher and generally thrown broadcast, with the intention of influencing the choice and opinion of readers. Very much the same kind of thing was done with Queen Victoria, and even with Mrs. Cleveland, and for that matter, with any person of prominence in any walk of life. Publishers kindly furnish with their new volumes the expressions of commendation which have been voiced upon them, though the initiated cannot but wonder whether the manuscripts have been passed from hand to hand, or whether writers, artists and actors, to say nothing of statesmen, have nothing else to do with their time than to pore over the pages of an embryotic book. The commendatory statements attributed to the President are precisely on the same footing as those culled from the reviews and used to push new editions. Divorced from their context, with words omitted and modifiers dropped behind, it is easy to take any criticism which contains even a solitary sentence not altogether commendatory, and make it appear complimentary to the volume under discussion. When Mr. Roosevelt, or any one else, writes, above his own signature, a letter in praise of a book he may be held to an accounting, but when it is merely reported that he has said, or is said to have said, good things about it or its author, it would be well to sprinkle a liberal allowance of salt over the statement before swallowing it. Times and circumstances are a factor in determining one's enjoyment of a book. People who lead sedentary lives, or are free from adventurous undertakings, are apt to have a predilection for exciting romances, and their quiet existence makes them less capable of judging whether the books are even good of their kind. It is all of a piece with the boys who long to be Wild Terrors of the Plains, yet are afraid to go to bed in the dark. Who so fond of lords and ladies as the household domestic or the humble shop girl? People who lead active brain-lives often enjoy trashy novels as a rest, just as one turns to corned beef or salt codfish after turkey and plum pudding. Because, under certain circumstances, one has enjoyed a book, it does not follow that that style of book, or even that identical volume would make the same impression at another time. There was, for example, that great-aunt of Sir Walter Scott's who importuned him to send her a set of the novels of an authoress who had had a great vogue in her girlhood, and which she had enjoyed hearing read aloud in the family circle. Greatly to her surprise, she found that what had been regarded as quite proper in her early years was of such a character that she could not read them in the privacy of her own apartments when she had passed her eightieth year. Times had changed and she had changed imperceptibly with them. We are all familiar with the railroad novel, the hammock novel, and a variety of others, which we should not attempt to read under different conditions. In that delightful juvenile book of Frank R. Stockton's, "A Jolly Fellowship," Rectus comes to the conclusion that there is no use in trying to read while traveling unless it is a "begun book," and most travelers will agree with him, for it is all but impossible to become interested in print when there is life and movement to distract the attention. There is no more reason why President Roosevelt should not express his opinion when a book has interested and diverted him than why any one else should not. He probably says quite as much condemnatory, only there is no capital to be made in repeating his remarks. The good or harm that is done is not in his saying what he thinks but in the lack of taste, judgment, decency, which makes the casual listener in such haste to repeat it.

Paul Elder & Co. announce for early publication a volume of essays and addresses by Professor David Starr Jordan. They also announce "The Limerick Uptodate Book," "Bachelor Bigotries," "Widows, Graves and Otherwise," a volume of drawing-room plays for amateurs by Grace Luce Irwin and a "Nature Book by Johnnie Jones, with spelling by his mother." This latter is a juvenile and one can but pray that it will be a real one for real children, and not a production aimed at the intellect of adults who indulge in children's parties. The "Cynic's Calendar of Revised Wisdom," which made such a success last Christmas, is to be brought out again for 1904, and in spite of the recent criticism that it is "a knacker's yard of spavined and ringboned jokes," the purchasing public will be apt to hail it with as much satisfaction as ever.

London's Latest Novels

And now, to a public a little weary of hothouse novels, comes Jack London with a new story of the Northland, vivid, pungent, invigorating; full of phrases that nip like frost and set the blood a-tingling—a story of a half-human dog, stolen from the "sun-kissed Santa Clara valley," and put, with fine artistry, through the fire (or rather, frost) of circumstances in the Devil's out-of-doors of the land of "White Silences," to the end that he may show what stuff he is made of to the more than interested reader. Buck is the great beast's name; and the history of his reversion—how he shakes off civilization and at length answers "The Call of the Wild"—reads very much like the history of man. Mr. London has the gift of first sight. He knows his facts and how to make fiction of them. The reader feels, too, in his own veins the driving force of Heredity. Like Buck, he also is "older than the days he has seen and the breaths he has drawn." On occasion his memory likewise gets back of birth and he pre-exists in the persons of his forebears. The story is truer than that which happens and will undoubtedly add in no small measure to the fame of the author.

The Baconian Cipher

The mid-summer number of the Book-Lover contains quite the usual number of good things, that is to say, nearly one hundred separate articles of interest to book-lovers, whether their interest lies in the latest production in print, or the earliest, and whether they be dealers, collectors or simply readers. One of the most interesting subjects treated in this number, under the title "Juggling with Type," concerns itself with Mrs. Gallup's Baconian cipher, in which she processes to have discovered not only that Bacon was Shakespeare, but that he was Greene, Marlowe, Burton, Spencer, and several other literary worthies, and a son of Queen Elizabeth into the bargain. The writer of this article concerns himself with the typographical probabilities alone, and points out the difficulties which would have rendered the "infolding" of the cipher practically impossible unless the printers were taken into confidence at least to the extent of knowing that the arbitrary mixture of fonts was for the purpose of inclosing other information than appeared on the surface. Then, as Bacon's "De Augmentis Scientiarum" was open to any of them, and the whole scheme of the cipher was there made clear, they were an exceptionally stupid set if no one of them attempted to study it out. On the other hand, if precautions were taken to prevent them from knowing why they were to mix the two fonts of type in such fashion, there must have been profanity enough and to spare about the composing room. Without making any other comment, the author says he is confident that by the same process that Mrs. Gallup has contrived to prove so much, and with a different value attached to her A and B, it would be possible to make Bacon or Shakespeare, which you choose, have predicted the Boer war. —The Bookworm.

Princess Maude Gold Mining Co.

On the front page of Town Talk this week appears an advertisement of the Princess Maude Gold Mining Company of Tonopah, Nevada, which is conceded by mining men to be one of the best properties in the Lone Mountain district. There is no other mining company in the State that offers better inducements than does the Princess Maude. The fact that the Board of Directors is composed of widely known business men of San Francisco should be an incentive for those speculatively inclined. W. F. Kane is the president, S. C. Denson, vice-president, E. P. Heald, treasurer and S. C. Wright, secretary. Their offices are located at 310 Ellis street and before investing in mining stock we would advise you to call upon the president, Mr. Kane, for fuller details.

Other People's Ideas

From "Sir Christopher," by Maud Wilder Goodwin:

It is not those who oppose, but those who fail to comprehend, who exasperate.

Ralph Ingle: He who takes a child by the hand takes the mother by the heart.

(Lord Baltimore's motto): Deeds are masculine, words feminine.

The people who help us most are those who make light of our achievements, and have faith in our possibilities.

Margaret: Ideas come with wrinkles, and are bought at a cost of years beyond their value.

From "Siege of Youth," by Frances Charles:

Much of the output of the best mental force is either a fencing match of wits or a filling in of space, with no motive for human good lurking beneath the empty phrases.

We may stand in the very stream of life, facing where we please, believing we will go our own way, shaking what we think are potent hands in the face of the great Achiever; but even as we dream and vow are we turned slowly, surely, relentlessly, by all-powerful undercurrents.

Some women are false and bad, but are kept respectable by circumstances. They do not fall, because there is no temptation; perhaps it may never come. More often it does.

Accident, oftener than effort, answers our prayers.

We are all different after certain vital happenings or after certain friendships, certain telling days or years. It is a time when our experiences have been poured into their mould and are setting; but we call it growing middle-aged.

Lovers must like to suffer, or they would make a little effort, at times, to know facts.

THE WHITE STEAM TONNEAU

Wins Six Cups = Makes a Sweep at Del Monte Races

The "White" Steam Carriage has long been known as the most reliable car on the market. It has won first honors in all endurance contests. The races at Del Monte, as well as the races at Los Angeles last May, show that this car is as speedy as it is certain. These races were all won by stock cars, and it is now conceded that the "White" has the speediest as well as the most reliable stock car of the year. Those who have never experienced the silent, easy running of the speedy "White" do not know the possibilities of automobiling. Among its advantages are light weight, speed, power, economy, large radius of operation, compound engine, condenser, chainless drive, and self-draining burner. Don't forget that this is a steam machine without a boiler, and it does not require an engineer either to run it or to care for it. Simplicity of operation is one of its strongest features. Write for descriptive literature, or call and see us.

Rockefeller After Morgan

Recent happenings in Wall street were of a very sensational character, and the speculative community suffered wofully in expiation of its excesses. The prices of securities declined without there having occurred a corresponding impairment in the conditions which ordinarily establish the value of securities. In other words there was a deliberate bear movement, and it was not the result of any ordinary influence being exerted upon the internal economy of Wall street. It was the Rockefeller issues which led the break and it was those same interests that brought reaction after Morgan had tried and failed to strengthen the market. The fact is that John D. Rockefeller was responsible for the disturbance, and it is believed that he was intent upon punishing J. Pierpont Morgan. The Rockefellers and Goulds are fighting the Morgan-Hill-Cassatt combination, and it now looks as though Mr. Morgan will soon cease to exercise the dominating influence in Wall street. The Rockefellers went after Keene and they caused him to drop a million and a half, and the probability is that Morgan will soon have to surrender to the Standard Oil. The battle of the financial giants is an interesting one, and fortunately most of the sufferers are rich gamblers who are in no sense producers but who have always profited upon the result of the labor of others.

The Giant Dwarfed

Not long ago J. P. Morgan was regarded in this country as the shrewdest financier in the world. No other individual enjoyed the confidence of financial institutions as did the wizard of Wall street. His career had been one long series of successful enterprises. He it was that pioneered the gigantic combinations of capital that caused all Europe to sit up and take notice of the great industrial progress of the United States. He ruled the financial affairs of the country, and even the Government depended upon him for guidance and assistance in one of the biggest financial deals ever engineered by the Treasury. But the sagacity of J. Pierpont Morgan is not unerring, as the difficulties which now embarrass the International Mercantile Marine Company demonstrate. Moreover J. Pierpont Morgan's magnetic hand, that so often stilled the turbulent waves of finance in crises of the past, utterly failed to check the recent storm, and it was no doubt humiliating to the erstwhile financial giant to find himself dwarfed by the Standard Oil colossus. Such is always the fate of the man who has lost prestige. Morgan's prestige was dimmed by recent developments in the affairs of the Mercantile Marine Company. It has leaked out that the capitalization was entirely too heavy and that the rate agreements with other competing lines could not last. Export trade has shrunk, and it has been learned that the vessels which the company owns were bought at a preposterously large overvaluation. With five exceptions they are of an old-fashioned type and do not compare with the new crack boats of the German companies. In addition to these untoward circumstances, ocean freight rates have dropped, and altogether Morgan's ship trust is in a bad fix. And now that it appears that the great financier is not infallible, people are wondering that anybody could have ever been so foolish as to imagine that such a concern as the ship trust could prove a success. But Morgan is a man of fine judgment and he may repeat his past triumphs and regain his prestige, but meanwhile he is not cutting such a wide swath in Wall street.

A Noble Miser

Mr. Russell Sage reached his eighty-seventh year a few days ago, but he made no fuss about it. He didn't even quit work. On the contrary he was busy at his office all day. Mr. Sage is one of the most unpopular of the big men of New York, and yet he possesses some virtues and is absolutely free from most of the vices. He was endowed by nature with an absorbing passion for money, and there is nothing that affords him so much pleasure as accumulating money. Indeed the indulgence of his sordid greed is his only recreation. He is unpopular because though he is possessed of great wealth he never gives any of it away. He is the richest and most consistent miser in the world. He differs from most rich misers in that he has the courage of his penuriousness. The fact is that the majority of our rich men are misers, but they make occasional contributions to charity and to public enterprises to avoid being popularly proclaimed to be what they are. It is easy for a rich man to avoid being stigmatized as a miser. If a multimillionaire gives away a small fraction of what his capital earns per minute he may yet be less prodigal than the salaried clerk whose contribution to charity is not more than twenty-five cents per month, and yet the man of wealth may pose as a philanthropist on the strength of his comparatively meagre donations. So in addition to being penurious the average millionaire practices deception to achieve a reputation to which he is not entitled. Mr. Sage is deserving of commendation for his frankness. It pains him to release money from his prehensile hands and he doesn't care who knows it. His recreation in life is the loaning of money to the best advantage. He has no penchant for expensive toys, and he derives no satisfaction from erecting statues or endowing libraries. His scheme of life may be narrow and unattractive, but a man who does what he wants to, and revels in doing it until long after the three score year and ten period, has a genius for circumscribing his aims and ambitions which is not to be despised. Some rich misers prefer to flaunt themselves in the political field and corrupt the fountains of justice and legislation to achieve a little glory. Surely they are not entitled to class with harmless old Russell Sage who merely makes money for the sake of making it. He could, if he desired, emulate Mr. Carnegie and seek to die poor, but that sort of thing has no charms for him. Absorbed with his own business, he has not meddled in other people's affairs. He has consistently refrained from instructing them, and unlike Mr. Rockefeller he hasn't even advised them to cultivate habits of frugality. He hasn't endowed a university in order to control the opinions of thinking men, and in short, he has done nothing to excite aversion except to make and hoard money.

Heed Not the Silurian

The voice of the Silurian is once more heard in the land. For several years nothing has occurred to disturb the serenity of the San Francisco representatives of the species. The city has been pursuing the even tenor of its way, and no great public improvements have been projected though many are needed. The apathy of the city government has been highly satisfactory to the silurian. He is always pleased when he is not being taxed for costly improvements. The most virulent silurian is the retired capitalist who enjoys a large income from real estate which he bought at the prices that prevailed in the days when the waters of the bay came up to Montgomery street. He takes no interest in civic progress which cannot be achieved for nothing. Propositions to beautify the city and to make it attractive are, in his opinion, absurd. Many of the silurian species spend most of their time in Europe, enjoying the attractions of the big and beautiful cities of the Old World. They have no desire to contribute to the improvement of this city because they seldom visit it. Why should they concern themselves with a sewer system or with a boulevard system in far-away San Francisco? As soon as they heard that it was proposed to create a big bonded debt in order to raise money for building sewers, school-houses and hospitals, they cabled to their agents who collect their rents to interpose strenuous objections. The principal argument of the silurians against issuing bonds is that a great deal of the money will be stolen. No doubt it will. We have not yet achieved the thorough purification of the municipal government, and it is reasonable to expect that if money is raised for public improvements some of it will be spent dishonestly. But if that were sufficient reason for not incurring a bonded debt then we should not raise money for any purpose, for even the ordinary revenues of the city enrich dishonest officers. We must expect to pay a great deal more for public improvements than they would cost if the government were in clean hands. Such has been the experience of all cities, but the anticipation of fraud never deterred them from projecting improvements. San Francisco possesses natural advantages which, with a liberal expenditure of money for their enhancement, will cause it to become the most beautiful city on the continent as well as the most desirable place of residence. Civic pride should prompt us to avail ourselves of the possibilities, and we should not be deterred by the croaking of the silurian.

The Juvenile Nuisance

The clamor which was raised by a child during the service at Anthony Hope's marriage has set the British weeklies to discussing the propriety of taking babies to weddings. But the argument has settled down not to the propriety of taking the baby to a wedding but of taking ill-disciplined children anywhere. It is not the mite of humanity that is objectionable but the disturbance which so many of them are permitted to make and the interruptions which they cause. There are children and children. Some of them are adorable under all circumstances and others are intolerable little nuisances at any time. Rank and condition have little to do with it. There are just as many ill-behaved brats amongst people of title as there are in the slums, and just as many little ladies and gentlemen in hovels as in palaces. It is purely a matter of discipline or the absence of it, and if the results of the lack could be confined to those who are responsible the rest of the world could bear it complacently enough. As it is, the parents are oblivious to the inconvenience of others, and for their own part, they are either quite hardened or unable to perceive anything objectionable in the unruly behavior of their offspring. When one is subjected to the ear-piercing shrieks of some sturdy youngster, in church, on railroad trains, or in hotel or boarding house, one fervently wishes that the good Susannah Wesley had passed down her recipe for teaching her numerous brood to "cry quietly." We have had a trial, for one generation now, of the tender-hearted method of raising children without restraint, so as not to dwarf their individuality, and it has not proved a success. All over the East the educational authorities are admitting that with no effective method of punishing pupils they are unable to maintain discipline, and there is an agitation of the question of restoring the rattan to its old place in the school curriculum. In every community it is acknowledged that juvenile criminals multiply, and the increase is not to be set down to mere mischief or to harmless acts which municipal legislation has declared to be misdemeanors. It is not ball-playing on the streets, obstructing sidewalks, or "sassing" police officers, but burglary, pocket-picking, vicious assaults and other evidences of depravity. Simultaneously there is a recommendation from the judges of the criminal courts that the whipping post be set up, while the number of immature girls who leave their homes to consort with criminals or irresponsibles is astonishing. When the Nora Fuller case was the topic of the hour the most surprising development of the affair was the number of little girls seen here and there under circumstances that were not even questionable, and the long list of those who had disappeared from the ken of their relatives without exciting a question or a comment, until it dawned upon the complacent parents that the fate of one might foreshadow the doom of all. The child whose obstreperous conduct at the Hope wedding has called for discussion in the London periodicals is a type of the age. It belongs to the class which has driven landlords to refusing to accept tenants with children, and hotel proprietors to exclude them from dining-rooms and parlors. It is quite as much indolence as kind-heartedness which causes the parents to permit their children to rule the roost, and in most instances the bad behavior of children is evidence of the ignorance of parents. The intelligent gentlewoman is careful to rear her offspring so that they shall not excite aversion, and she doesn't have to use the rod for corrective purposes.

A Case of Impudent Meddling

It has been a blue moon since our local busybody association has found a subject so much to its liking as the rounding up and corraling of those twenty-five little gypsies. Twenty-five at once is a good haul, and the State appropriation will be a godsend to the institution which obtains the guardianship of them, but it is not to be supposed that the parents will meekly surrender without making a fight to retain their progeny. And why should they not? What more can the Aunt Betties and the charitable associations do for the little nomads than is being done for them now by their natural and proper guardians? The children, to be sure, are dirty, but they are well-nourished, healthy and happy. There is no evidence to show that they are not comfortably clothed, or that their manners and morals are more neglected than are those of the average youngster. What is to be gained by confining them in asylums and homes? Absolutely nothing but the severing of family ties, the weakening of natural affections, and an additional tax upon the community. Apparently the lack of shoes offends the esthetic sensibilities of the ladies who have never "known the freedom of the sod," but if it is the exposure of the bare skin which grieves their hearts, let them look about at the thin shanks of the shivering little fashionables. The gypsy children have never in their lives known the pressure of leather on their feet, while the poor little fashion-plates were but yesterday swathed in flannel drawers to their ankles, with woollen stockings drawn tight over them and leather leggings superadded, because they "looked so cunning." Young Master Gypsy is used to freedom and fresh air. Instead of cowering over a register or a gas grate, when he feels chilled he warms his blood by a vigorous race or a game of action. He eats coarse food with relish and digests it without drugs. In truth and fact, he lives as near as may be in these sophisticated times an ideal life, and if he learns little from books, he has the less to forget because of its uselessness. In face of the fact that doctors are urging that the children of civilization be kept more out of the hot-house atmosphere of school, dressed sensibly and with a smaller number of garments and permitted to romp and race and develop in the fresh air; when camping in the woods without shelter is recommended for consumptives, and the "barefoot cure" has thousands of advocates; when "walking tours" are a fashionable divertisement, it is the height of the ridiculous to have objections interposed to the bringing up of the gypsies, whose daily life puts into practice these precepts not as a summer fad but as a regular method. The children learn to tramp long miles in summer heat or winter cold and do it uncomplainingly. They thrive on coarse fare, and they are independent of soft beds and air-tight habitations. They learn more of woodcraft and bird lore than all the text books of all the teachers and professors could furnish them. While the children of the poor are herded into tenements, from which the only escape is the foul street or the close and stuffy school room, the little gypsies roam in field and wood. Our little city folks are fed on unwholesome food for their bodies and just as unwholesomely crammed with nonsensical scraps from the educational refuse heap, while the gypsies eat perhaps more sparingly, but of such food as nature intended and largely provides. They may not learn much of the cut and dried wisdom of the schools, but what knowledge they imbibe is in line with their practical needs, and once taught, it is learned for all time. They use their limbs not in marching up and down stairs in lock step, but in the freedom of the road, and their lungs are expanded because their every word is not hushed by consideration of the baby asleep in the corner of the room or the class on the other side of the partition. Master Gypsy grows up to follow in the footsteps of his father, to breed and buy and sell horses and stock, while the children of the poor in cities, and having come to the age of discretion where they can be fairly trusted to cross the street alone, become newsboys, bootblacks, factory workers, glass blowers, or anything else at which they can find occupation, no matter how long the hours, how hard the work or how unsanitary the conditions. If these little nomads, accustomed to the free life of the tents and the camps, are taken perforce from their natural and accustomed environment and compelled to conform to the rules and regulations of some State institution, there will be open defiance and rebellion, but that will be the smallest part of the evil. The experiment which met with such dismal failure three or four decades ago, when kindly and well intentioned people tried to take Indian girls and teach them the details of housekeeping and nursing, will be repeated. One after another the girls fell sick, and after lingering a few years, in spite of all that could be done for them, they faded away from consumption. The gypsy children will not live to profit by their "educational advantages." As long as the State can do nothing which the parents are not already attending to, much less do that as well, by what authority does the association of busybodies interfere at all? But unless the gypsy characteristics have radically changed, it will be apt to prove a case of putting the hand between the bark and the tree.

The Various Woman

BY HARRY COWELL

Age cannot wither her, nor Custom stale
Her infinite variety.—Shakespeare.

Man is by nature a polygamous animal. By necessity only is he monogamic. Nothing short of divine grace can cause him to attain that ideal of modern civilization, "one woman only." Hence tragedy after tragedy, and no little comedy. This, man's instinct for more than one, makes marriage interesting. Every loving wife is at war with nature; has a private problem on her hands. With men of the "artistic temperament," curious, panting for experiences, dreading lest death should take them before they had time to say, "I have lived," imagination comes to the aid of the instinct. That much bepraised paragon, the constant husband, is often no better than a dull fellow, his faithfulness due to defective fancy. Indeed, physical fidelity is an easy enough matter, and well within the will; but to keep the heart at home; to prevent the imagination from making "unlawful" love, even to an ideal—this is labor.

The cynic thinks there are excellent reasons for believing that the first man was really quite true to his wife. As for me, I have my doubts of old Adam. Had not he also the image-making faculty? He had; and I have my doubts.

Then there is the problem of possession. "Possession, why, more tasteless than pursuit?" Love is a law unto itself; and lack of possession seems to be nine points of it—at least for man. Not maidenly timidity, but the half-fear that, in gaining a husband, she may lose a lover, that the consummate honey-moon may wane into a chill morning crescent and never wax again, has caused more than one observant young woman to defer her wedding-day.

Literature is full of the dismal thesis that possession is more tasteless than pursuit. Here is how it runs in Andrew Lang's sad-sweet lyric:—

"Who wins his love shall lose her,
Who loses her shall gain,
For still the spirit wooes her,
A soul without a stain;
And Memory still pursues her
With longings not in vain!"

And so on for three other beautiful and tearful stanzas. George Moore makes Mike Fletcher, beloved of many women, love one only—the one he could not win.

Man, finite being that he is, longs for infinity; faithful though he may be, finds variety charming. "The one rule," then, for life as well as for literature, "is to be infinitely various." To come to the end of a woman beloved; to know her through and through, to feel that for you she holds no further hint of eternity, no mystery unsolved, no height unscaled, no depth unsounded, no beauty unrevealed; for evermore neither subtlety nor suggestion, nor any dream of dead lives or lives unlived: is fatal to love, and full of tears.

The various woman is never wholly won, certainly not for long; never won once and for all; never passes into a man's possession like his ox or his ass or anything that is his; but is won once, and again, and yet again; wooed and won each day, until at length the Great Spirit leads into the Happy Hunting Grounds pursuer and pursued.

The various woman is mysterious as midnight, majestically frank as midday, alluring as the half-lights, repellant as the frost, boundless and fathomless as the sea, and as full of memories. Her lover finds her more wonderful than winds or waves, more sweetly wild than a bird's song or a forest flower, fairer than dawns or sunsets. Now she keeps a starlike silence, and anon is melodiously noisy like running waters. Today she is near and familiar as earth, a realization; tomorrow, distant and unknown as heaven, a hope. More delightful is she than the women of his dreams, more fair than his daylight fancies. By miracle of intuition she forestalls his imaginings. She is Cleopatra; she is Juliet. Helen, too, and Francesca is she—Aspasia even, if, dreaming of strange women, dear dead women, he will have her such. Her husband is by nature a polygamist. Well, she will be fifty wives. And even as, when he desires them, she is of the wonder women who are now with the snows of yester-year, so, should he long for the love of future women fairer yet it may be, she steals what is to be for love's sweet usage, and keeps him faithful.

"What man is worth all these precious pains?" asks some possible artist-wife, with fine scorn. No man, it may be; but Love. And yet there are men, a redeeming few, who, adding to themselves daily, daily come as new lovers, they and their additions, to be accepted over again by the various woman of their choice; men who, desiring love and knowing how delightful and delicate a thing it is, strive earnestly and unceasingly to deserve it, using all possible means to the end of maintaining it at its height; men, many-sided, and wishing a wife for every side; men polygamous still, in spite of priest and law-maker and Mrs. Grundy, but willing to confine their unfaithfulness within the infirmity of the various woman.

The Saunterer

The Primary Election

The primary election last Tuesday was a close contest so far as the struggle for control of the Democratic convention was concerned. The Democratic League made a splendid showing in view of the fact that it was opposed by the regular organization with the backing of all the tax-eaters in the City Hall. The McNab-Phelan combination, with the advantage and prestige that go with possession of the works, secured only ten out of the eighteen districts, and there are many of the delegates elected by the regular organization who are not very strong in their allegiance to the allied bosses. So it is by no means certain that the bosses will be able to organize the convention. The League is now in a fair way to compete for control of the State organization next year. McNab will probably be able to nominate Franklin K. Lane for office, but the latter may not be so anxious now to run in view of the fact that Mayor Schmitz secured control of the Labor party and will be a candidate for re-election.

The Misleading of Hearst

The result of the election demonstrated the sophistry of the arguments used to persuade Mr. William R. Hearst to desert the men who started out to capture the Democratic organization, and to "turn down" Mayor Schmitz in favor of the repudiated Michael Casey. The erstwhile teamster suffered a crushing defeat at the polls despite the fact that the Examiner supported him. It was Casey and his associates who intimidated Hearst into withdrawing his support from the Democratic League. They feared that a split in the Democracy would result in the loss of many of the labor votes with which they expected to beat Schmitz. But the withdrawal of the Examiner did not have the desired effect of discouraging the reorganizers. They kept on reorganizing, and notwithstanding the plethoric Phelan sack they succeeded in electing a pretty solid delegation which will enable them to wield considerable influence in the convention and pave the way for a battle for supremacy in the State campaign.

Casey's Treachery Proves Fatal

The victory of Mayor Schmitz means the repudiation of the Casey-Livernash combination. The treacherous Casey allied himself with the Congressman some time ago for the purpose of ousting the Schmitz element from the Labor party. He expected to capture the machine, and then enter into a combination with Gavin McNab for the municipal election. If he had won, the Labor party would have endorsed Franklin K. Lane. The Republican League managers were very much afraid that such a coalition would be made, and they were consequently elated over the victory of Schmitz. Though organized labor showed very little strength at the primary it asserted its disapproval of the methods of Casey and Livernash. Casey was appointed to office by Mayor Schmitz and immediately proceeded to enter into political combinations against him. He assumed the role of a reformer but he deceived nobody as to his motives. His treachery excited sympathy for the man he had treated so shamefully. Livernash was a fit associate for Casey, and he has lost what little political prestige came to him in the last political campaign. He will serve one term in Congress and that will be his last.

The Republican Love Feast

That remarkable organization, the Republican League, in which are associated in close copartnership the men who have been denouncing one another with vitriolic vehemence through several campaigns, carried everything before them last Tuesday. They put the quietus on Colonel Dan Burns, and laid the unspeakable Kelly low. It is now quite certain that the two newspaper proprietors, Mr. M. H. De Young and Mr. John D. Spreckels, will become delegates to the next Republican National Convention. They are once more in the camp of that astute boss of all the bosses, Mr. William F. Herrin, and he will show his appreciation of their acquiescence in his latest political plans by permitting them to go to the National convention, and also by vouchsafing them a voice in the selection of the candidates for the municipal offices. The Republican managers are no longer worrying over the selection of a candidate for Mayor. The split in the Labor party, and the poor showing made by organized labor at the polls, are significant of the reaction in public sentiment. They are now rather pleased with the prospect of Lane becoming the Democratic nominee but fear that he is too smart to jeopardize his political future in such a contest. Lane's appeals to union labor in the State campaign were redolent of demagoguism, and the Republican managers intend to adopt "Down with Demagogues" as the slogan of the campaign.

Tampering With Affections

It's the prevailing delusion nowadays that there is nothing so effective as the ozone of the briny when taken as an antidote for the insidious philtres administered by Dan Cupid. That is why several of our fashionable belles have recently been shipped to foreign parts, and in the case of Miss Ella Morgan it resulted in alienating her affections from the man who flattered himself that they were in his keeping. However her case was an exceptional one. It remains to be seen whether handsome Mary Bailey's affections are as easily defected. Miss Bailey is going to China, and she is in love with a young man, a Berkeley student, to whom she has pledged eternal fidelity. She is to make the trip with Mr. Fearon who married Emily Torbert and who is in business in China. He recently went to Europe to meet his daughter who has been educated over there, and they are to pass through this city in October on their way to China, when they will be joined by the charming Miss Bailey.

Mary Is Quite Contrary

The charming Miss Bailey is the daughter of the equally charming Mrs. Norris who has twice worn the weeds of a widow, and who is yet young and handsome notwithstanding the fact that she is the mother of two daughters, one of whom, Helen Bailey, is to debut next winter. Indeed Mrs. Norris, it is thought by some of her friends, is not yet immune to Cupid's wiles. It has been remarked that Rothwell Hyde is very attentive to her, and some there are who believe that he has been smitten by the pretty widow's charms, and may suggest to her a third trip to the altar. But that is another story. Meanwhile Mrs. Norris appears to be most deeply concerned with the love affair of her daughter Mary who, by the way, has inherited the beauty of her mother's family which was so pleasingly accentuated in Mrs. John F. Swift, the aunt of the Bailey girls. The object of Miss Mary's affections is an estimable young man, but his future is problematical, and Mrs. Norris feels, perhaps, that her daughter should make a better match. But daughter is thoroughly satisfied, and though she is going to take the trip to China she is quite sure that the briny ozone will have no effect upon her.

More Notoriety for Cornelia

A lot of good advertising is going to waste on that very active little widow, Cornelia Baxter Tevis. How she must be envied by many a poor and unexploited actress who needs the notoriety and the money! The widow Tevis takes to the limelight just as a duck does to water, and at the same time she affects to abhor publicity. The story from Bar Harbor doesn't picture her in the attitude of one shrinking from notoriety. On the contrary she appears to have craved it, and to have had the co-operation of Mr. Ernest Wiltsee, that spectacular mining promoter, who keeps bobbing up in the public prints every little while. A little while ago I related that the ebullient widow had enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. Wiltsee on a trip to Mexico, and I also reported that there were rumors of their engagement. Shortly after that Mr. Wiltsee made his appearance in this city, and he took occasion to deny that he contemplated a matrimonial alliance with the rich widow. Though their friendship may be merely platonic it appears to be ripening into a more sentimental relationship.

Edie Was Too Intrepid

When Wiltsee returned to this city from Mexico, the widow Tevis was not far away. She visited a few watering places, but she made no social progress, and soon vanished. Wiltsee disappeared about the same time, and when next heard from they were figuring in a Bar Harbor scandal which was precipitated by the action of a woman who appears to have been authorized by the widow to complain of the conduct of Lieutenant Edie of the navy. The lieutenant, it appears, visited the home of Mrs. Tevis and her sister under the misapprehension that they were unconventional young Western women who were fond of the intrepid style of amorous dalliance. The lieutenant was charged with conduct unbecoming an officer, but he is not likely to be prosecuted. Altogether, it was a very unfortunate affair, and the young officer was not the only participant guilty of an indiscretion. Wiltsee figured in the role of the widow's gallant defender and his scrap with Edie must have been amusing, for the latter, I am told by a man who attended the naval academy with him, is about five feet eight inches in height, while the mining man is over six feet.

The Edies of Washington

The father of Cornelia Baxter Tevis, who is no modest violet himself, lost no time in rushing into print on the heels of the Bar Harbor episode. Mr. Baxter is the gentleman who flaunted his family pedigree in this city for awhile. He took occasion to denounce young Edie as "one of the few scrubs in the navy." Young Edie enjoys an excellent reputation among naval officers all over the world, and he is not likely to be condemned by them without a hearing, for what he is reported to have done at Bar Harbor. If there is anything in rearing the presumption should be in Edie's favor. Edie's family has strikingly demonstrated that money is by no means the powerful factor of social advancement in Washington that it is in other cities of the Union. The Edies have always been extremely poor, so poor, in fact, that when the lieutenant's father, a gallant army officer, died, his widow had to accept a government clerkship in one of the departments in order to support herself and her two children. Despite this poverty, however, Mrs. Edie's modest little house, in an unfashionable part of Fifteenth street, was frequented by the best of the best of Washington society. Young Edie's sister, Miss Julia Edie, was long an acknowledged belle in the smartest set, and was often one of the receiving hostesses at the White House during Presidential entertainments. What they lacked in wealth, the Edies more than made up in good breeding and personal popularity, with the result that they were welcomed everywhere, and the son obtained his appointment to Annapolis without difficulty.

A Pious Rear-Admiral

during the recent naval manoeuvres off the Maine coast, is one of the interesting characters of the service. He is probably the most intensely religious officer in the navy, and, being a devout Catholic, he spends much of his time in the solitude of his cabin when the exigencies of the service make it impossible to attend mass on shore. During these periods he is invisible to every one, the orderly at his door preventing interruption by the brief statement: "The commanding officer is at his devotions, sir." Sands's solicitude for his spiritual welfare has kept him singularly free from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, with the result that he is regarded by his brother officers as anything but a man of the world. A striking illustration of his innocence of worldly knowledge was furnished upon the return to him, by a relative, of a small loan that the latter had obtained. The relative mailed Sands a cheque drawn upon the American Loan and Trust Company, one of Boston's largest and most dignified banking houses, and signed by a business man with a German name. Sands frigidly acknowledged the receipt of the cheque, but stingingly reproached the sender for giving "a pawnbroker's cheque," as he termed it, in payment, asserting that it humiliated him to present the same at his bank. The German name suggested a Hebrew, and this, coupled with the terms "loan and trust," created the inference that the conscientious relative had "hocked" something to make good his loan.

The Ingratitude of "Fighting Bob"

Apropos of Rear-Admiral Sands I am reminded of the ingratitude of "Fighting" Bob Evans, who is popularly regarded as one of the idols of the navy. The facts I am about to relate have never been published. Sands and Evans participated in the assault by the naval brigade upon Fort Fisher, in 1865, and when Evans was wounded Sands bound up his wounds with a piece of his own shirt, drew Evans to a place of comparative safety, and then pressed on. After the war, Sands was recommended, by a board of admirals, for promotion, for gallantry upon this and other occasions, but the recommendation was not heeded. At every succeeding session of Congress his advancement was blocked by powerful influence, and Evans was one of the most active of his opponents. The advancement would have bettered Sands's position in his grade, at the expense of Evans. Rear-Admiral Sands is well known on this coast. He comes of an old naval family, being a son of the late Rear-Admiral B. F. Sands, who was a cousin of Rear-Admiral Joshua R. Sands, and long engaged in the Coast Survey in California and Oregon. He is a brother-in-law of Colonel Robert W. Meade, who now commands the marine garrison at the Mare Island navy yard.

An Ominous Threat

This is one of Madame La Bavarde's latest:

When an officer who is constantly characterized by an admiring young woman as one of the most popular young men in the service, uses the name of a lady (with whose acquaintance he has never been honored) as might a south-of-Market hoodlum, is it not time to inquire about his status among his brother officers, and his record as filed in the department in Washington?

Those remarks are very much in the nature of a threat, and I am surprised that such an amiable woman as Madame La Bavarde should descend to that sort of journalism. Moreover I am surprised that the editor of the Bulletin permitted the publication of the paragraph. The only inference to be deduced from the paragraph is that the officer in question is known to have an unsavory record, and that unless he cease annoying a certain woman Madame La Bavarde will show him up. Paragraphs of that sort are not usually penned by reputable journalists. Blackmailers compel the attention of their victims by such methods. But of course Madame La Bavarde was inspired by good motives. However her method of silencing a blackguard is unfortunate. If she knows that the officer is a disreputable character, and that he is slandering a woman, she should deny that he is "the most popular man in the service" and tell why he is not. She need not involve the name of the woman. Perhaps Madame La Bavarde herself is the woman in the case, but even so I am on her staff for the undoing of the villain.

"How did she break into society?"

"She wrote a book and was admitted as a literary lion."

"Was it a brilliant work?"

"I don't know; you see she never succeeded in having it published."

Barham a Benedict

This is one of the club jokes on the recent marriage of Guy Barham, the Los Angeles beau brummel, and Miss Marie Baby of Windsor:

"Always knew Guy would capture more than any other man in the matrimonial market—gets a bride and a baby at the same time."

Barham's marriage was a great surprise to his friends, for he was regarded as the most self-satisfied bachelor on the coast. Besides he was one of the gayest, and he had a great passion for actresses. Nearly all the noted women of the stage knew the genial raconteur of Los Angeles, and many of them have enjoyed his hospitality during their visits to the metropolis of the citrus belt. But Barham was noted for the impartiality with which he bestowed his attentions, and he explained that it was not sentiment but merely appreciation of genius that inspired his hospitality.

Recollections of Dalziel

Davidson Dalziel, who is reported to have grown rich in London and whose daughter is soon to marry a Belgian millionaire, was a hustling newspaper man in this city twenty-five years ago. He was a man of fertile resources with a faculty for interesting people with money in newspaper enterprises. He came hither from Australia, and he wasn't here very long before he induced Mark McDonald, who was an aspirant for the United States Senatorship, to back him in a daily paper. He established a very lively and sensational daily called the Mail which he published in an office in Commercial street near Montgomery. He gathered around him some of the brightest young newspaper men of the day, prominent among whom were Arthur McEwen and Tom Flynn. It was a peppery paper while it lasted, but expenses were high, McDonald grew tired of putting up and in time the sheriff was after Dalziel. He figured in many exciting episodes while publishing the paper, and shortly after the smash-up he went to Chicago, where he published a scurrilous weekly which was soon swamped with libel suits. Later he obtained the backing of a millionaire with whose money he established a news agency in London which has proved very successful. While in this city Dalziel married "Dickey" Lingard who was a popular actress in the old California stock company. She is the mother of the girl who is soon to wed the Belgian millionaire.

Mr. and Mrs. T. O. Smith entertained Mr. and Mrs. Calvert Wilson and General T. F. Wilson in a novel fashion at the handsome San Jose residence of the host and hostess last Saturday evening. The entertainment consisted of a garden vaudeville and the front porch of the residence served as a stage. The auditorium was a canvas arbor. The thirty-five guests were entertained with songs and some delightful instrumental musical numbers by society amateurs. As the guests presented their tickets, each was given in return a souvenir basket containing a delicious lunch. Those taking part in the program were Miss Grace Barstow, Mrs. Mildreth-Spencer Hartman, Mrs. Kathryne Wilson, Miss Nella Rogers, Mrs. Hillman Smith, Egnert Georges, Frederick Cornell, Charles W. Knox and T. O. Smith.

Redding's Rapier Invites Harrison's Bludgeon

Nothing that occurred at the Midsummer Jinks of the Bohemian Club caused so much comment as did the exchange of sarcastic jolts between Joe Redding and William Greer Harrison. The handsome lawyer with the classic brow and artistic temperament who has been on velvet ever since he had Princess Hatzfeldt for a client, opened the batteries of his wit on the veteran athlete at the dinner which preceded the jinks. Harrison was not present, but his absence did not discourage Redding who took occasion to point out the futility of some of the insurance man's pretensions. Among other things he said that Harrison loved to pose as a Celt whereas it was generally believed that he was merely celluloid. The speech was one of good-natured derision, but several of the clubmen lost no time in acquainting Harrison with the fact that he had been made the target of Redding's wit. Harrison's opportunity came the next morning at breakfast when speeches were again in order. He undertook to cover Redding with confusion, but the veteran athlete's sense of humor is not so well developed as his muscles. He is not a good after-dinner speaker, especially if he has had a bad night nursing wounded feelings. His satire is somewhat ponderous. He went at Redding hammer-and-tongs style, and he made the lawyer wince. Indeed, it was suspected that he was in deadly earnest, and some of his hearers thought that his references were insulting. But of course he was only joking. However, efforts were made to suppress him. Attorney Mastick tried to shut him off by demanding that he come to the point. Harrison gruffly retorted that as Mastick had no sense he couldn't see the point. The way that Harrison grilled Redding has been the talk of Bohemia ever since the jinks.

Phelan's Raw Work

Another incident that provoked much unpleasant discussion was the action of Jimmy Phelan in arbitrarily determining what appeared to be a tie vote on the question as to whether the Montezuma drama should be repeated in San Francisco. There was so much enthusiasm over the success of the affair that some suggested that it should be repeated in the city for the benefit of those who were unable to attend . The matter was brought up for discussion at breakfast, and many opposed the proposition on the ground that the spectacular effects which were the most striking feature of the jinks could not be reproduced in a club house. It was put to a vote, and the noes appeared to be as numerous and emphatic as the ayes. However, President Phelan declared the motion carried, though it was manifestly unfair to do so. Thereupon the remark was made in a stage whisper, "I guess Jimmy thinks he's running one of his political conventions."

The Poetic Drama

Louis A. Robertson, the poet of Bohemia, achieved a triumph with his dramatic episode entitled "Montezuma," which was produced in the grove. The drama is based on the conquest of Montezuma by Cortez and upon the accepted accounts of the sacrificial rites which prevailed at that period in the land of the Aztecs. With these has been interwoven the tradition that foretold the coming of a conqueror from beyond the Eastern sea. The entire play is pregnant with this portent. Priests chant it and astrologers tell it. Montezuma, finally convinced of its truth, calls his captains and chiefs for a suitable sacrifice to propitiate the God of War. A youth, glowing with patriotic pride, offers himself for the sacrifice and in doing so breaks the heart of a young girl to whom he has been wedded but a month. He is accepted, and just as his heart is cut out the cannon of Cortez are heard thundering in the distance. Bob Aitken, who played the victim, made a splendid figure in the nude. The drama is written in sonorous blank verse, of which these lines of the astrologer are typical:

Kalyptol Preserves the TEETH and GUMS

King, I have come from where the mighty loom
Of midnight weaves the starry silver strands
Into the fabric of a fate that few
Have knowledge to unravel or reveal.
A hundred times and more hath yonder sun
Soared from the sombre midnight to the morn
And blotted from the jeweled page of night
The starry charactry wherein are writ
The secrets fate doth in the future hide.
A hundred times my straining eyes have seen
The stars flash forth a hint of hidden things.
But ere I grasped the secret, it was dead
Within the dawning of another day.
Last night I saw the belted giant climb
Into the blazing canopy above
And with his sword toueh Teocallis towers;
Then in the mystic moment I became
As one, half blind, feels from his clouded eyes
The scales that veiled his vision fall away,
And reads aright at last the tale of truth.
As from the glamouring gloom I turn my gaze
To scan the charted records of the skies.
My finger fell upon the fateful spot
And there I read great Montezuma's doom.

The Burial of Care

The burial of care followed the drama, during which Uncle George Bromley, the High Priest of Bohemia, recited these lines, written by Louis Robertson for the occasion:

However fair the day may dawn when in the dark it dies,
There seems to roll above the gloom a requiem of sighs.

And yet there is no night so long, but morning with it brings
The faith that gives the soul again Hope's new unwearied wings.

Then swift it soars to where it sees some glowing haven gleam,
And lark-like, cleaves the melting mist to clasp the luring dream.

Sometimes we realize the dream, and for a moment live
Within the calm content and peace the world can never give.

Ah, if that moment and its bliss we could one day detain,
Then Eden's garden glades were ours to wander through again.

The best philosophy is that which lets the Present cast
A curtain o'er the dreary days and doings of the Past;

That trusts the future with a faith that would not fear to look
On every pale or pregnant page of its mysterious book.

These are the musings which are wont to come to us tonight,
As here we stand to fling again with our accustomed rite,

The burden of our griefs and groans upon the pyre of Care,
And see it vanish in the flames that feed upon it there.

Jack London's Fame

On the threshold of his literary career Jack London finds that matrimonial shackles chafe, and after a little over three years of married life he has separated from his wife to pursue the career which so propitiously opens before him, in the solitude of bachelor quarters. Four years ago I called attention to the budding literary genius across the bay which is now full-blown, and which gives promise of attracting world-wide attention. Jack London is a young man, not having passed his twenty-seventh year, but his intellectual genius has already won recognition. He has struggled hard for success, and has had the usual experience of poor and ambitious authors who, until they achieved something that riveted the attention of publishers, found that bread-winning at the point of the pen is a most discouraging occupation. He has written several stories that were commended by critics, but it was not until the publication, a few weeks ago, of "The Call of the Wild" that he realized the measure of success that he has long craved. This book removes all doubt as to the genius of London, and in addition to being a meritorious work it is having a large sale. London, however, will not share in the profits, for he sold the copyright to the publishers for nine hundred dollars, and all that he received in addition was fifteen hundred for the serial rights owned by the Saturday Evening Post of Philadelphia. London, by the way, is largely a self-educated young man. He spent a little while at Berkeley but soon found that a college course would be of little benefit to him. He is a philosophical chap, and it is his theory that love is madness and that intellect, and not passion, should influence people in the selection of a better-half.

He Loves the Sea

The chief pleasure of Jack London is his boat, a sloop-yacht, in which he loves to explore the crannies of the bay. To sail a boat, he says, is to be happy and care-free. He also shares with our Chinese and Japanese cousins a love of kite-flying. He has been all sorts of things besides Klondiker and author, all kinds of a sailor, from a salmon fisherman to oyster pirate and longshoreman. When only seventeen he shipped before the mast as able seaman going as far as Japan. Incidentally it may be mentioned that London looks his best, not in conventional evening attire, but in the sweater and rough trousers he wears on his boat.

Perpetuating Family Pride

Mrs. Stanford enriched (?) the museum of Stanford University the other day, by adding to the famous freak collection which has long contributed to the gayety of visitors, a volume on the genealogy of the Lathrop family and a tea set that was one of her mother's wedding presents. The Lathrop family, be it known, is the family of Mrs. Leland Stanford, and therefore the volume will no doubt be eagerly devoured by bibliophiles in quest of light reading, and desirous of an acquaintanceship with the style of those hack-writers whose pens are ever ready to supply food for the vanity of the rich. When Mrs. Stanford shall have passed away the trustees of the university will probably agree that the destruction of the Stanford collection in the museum would be the most charitable service that could be rendered to the memory of the generous, noble and amiable woman. The university itself will always stand as a monument to the memory of the Stanford family. It would be unfortunate if the megalomaniac whims of its members were to be forever recalled by that freak collection of family mementoes so eloquent of silly family pride.

"You are going to receive a kiss," said the fortune-teller.

Caduc's Little Romance

Though he has been dead about a year it has leaked out but recently that Commodore Philip Caduc, the veteran yachtsman, like many of the old Californian pioneers, lived a double life that was not without the usual romantic flavoring. Though he had some domestic trouble owing to the discovery being made that his affections had been alienated, it was not until after his death that his family knew that he was the father of a child not the offspring of his marriage Many of his friends recall that quite often, on yacht cruises, Caduc was accompanied by a boy but they never suspected that the lad was his child. It has since developed that the companion of his cruises was his child, and the one that inherited most of what little property he left. But that is not the most interesting circumstance involved in the story. The child that was known aboard the yacht as a boy was not a boy. The child was Caduc's daughter whom he attired in boy's clothes, so that her presence on board the yacht would not excite curiosity. Such is the story now being told in the club circles which Caduc was wont to frequent.

The Coming of the Hearsts

The latest news of the William R. Hearsts is that they have ended their bridal tour through Europe, and that they will visit the coast next month. The newspaper proprietor is coming out for two purposes, to look over his political fences and to present young Mrs. Hearst to his mother. There will probably be a reception at the Hearst hacienda in honor of Mrs. Willie Hearst, and of course the bride of the young millionaire newspaper proprietor will be the object of great curiosity. During his visit Mr. Hearst will renew those conciliatory tactics that were begun when he was out here some months ago, and which were so readily appreciated by Gavin McNab and Jimmy Phelan.

Invitations from Newport

Peter Martin has sent invitations to this city to a dinner which he is going to give at the Newport Casino on August seventeenth, and at which there are to be seventy guests. Of course Peter knows that the local people to whom he sent the invitations will not cross the continent to observe his splurging in the Newport swim, but he sent out the cards just to keep his friends au courant with his doings in Eastern fashionable circles. Among those who received an invitation was Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who has been keeping very quiet of late out of respect to the memory of Pope Leo XIII. She has been very careful to avoid making any more "bad breaks" ever since her notable gaucherie when she gave a dinner in Lent to several Catholic church dignitaries. Mrs. Martin would like to attend the Casino dinner of the Peter D. Martins but she is reluctant to put any more of the Martin money into circulation in Newport than is absolutely necessary to sustain the Eastern reputation of the family for liberality.

Like Old Times

The smart set has been having a very gay outing at Del Monte. The belles and beaux of the Blingum clique are always in exuberant spirits when they congregate at Monterey but this season they disported themselves with something like the abandon of the long ago, when many of the swagger girls who are sedate and proper matrons now were wont to proclaim their freedom from conventionality and startle the prudes by their feats of daring. The clubhouse is the scene of much festivity this year, and there has been a great deal of cork-popping even in the wee sma' hours. The polo and auto races aroused a great deal of interest this year and attracted people from all over the State. On the day of the auto races Pearl Landers proved herself a heroine by riding round the track with young Whittell in his big French racer. They made the circuit twice at a little more than a mile a minute gate. It was a very daring thing for a young woman to do. Miss Landers looked very fetching in a pretty white summer frock. One of the interesting events of the season was a reception given by Mrs. George Reed, wife of Captain Reed of the Eighth Cavalry, to Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who has been keeping in the background since the Pope's death. Mrs. Reed is the daughter of General Young, who was at one time so attentive to Mrs. Martin that the gossips inferred that he contemplated marrying the rich widow I believe Mrs. Martin thought so, too.

The Immaculate Garbed Dowager

There were some beautiful frocks exhibited at Del Monte, notably by Mrs. Frank Carolan, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, and the daughters of John D; also Helen De Young. Though costumes of white have ceased to be the fashion in the East, they are more the rage than ever out here. We are so slow in adopting styles that naturally we are tardy in discarding those that have ceased to be de rigueur. Even Mrs. Martin is partial to white, and she appeared in a succession of white costumes at Monterey. How times have changed! Some years ago it was considered undignified for a grandmother to wear anything but sombre hues, but Mrs. Martin is nothing if not fashionable.

The Saucy Thing!

That disgustingly absurd creature, Harry Lehr, whose combination of masculine garb and effeminate nature is a curious anomaly that should justify scientific speculation, has introduced a new fed. Lehr is a type of the degenerate manhood that abounds in the aristocracy which the dailies love to exploit. What ever Lehr does is approved in Newport. Last week he appeared at the Newport Casino and at a tennis tournament with a wrist bag. It was a dainty square purse, made of gold links, attached to a slender gold chain dangling from his wrist. The chain was coiled around his wrist twice. It was at first thought that the purse belonged to his wife and that he was carrying it for her, but he explained, in his high-pitched tenor voice, that if they supposed he was carrying the bag for any one else except himself they were mistaken. He said that he found it very useful to hold small change, a pencil and odds and ends. Harry Lehr is responsible for many innovations in the social world, and as there are men that ape him perhaps the wrist-bag will become fashionable with the male of his species in Newport. It was Lehr that inaugurated monkey parties and functions at which adults appeared as children. One day he walked down the street in Newport with Mrs. Fish, each of them holding the hand of a rag doll. He designed dresses for his women friends, and recently there was a story printed, the truth of which is denied, that he slept with a rose in his hair.

His Piquant Humor

When Lehr was married it was predicted that he would retire into the wings of the social stage, but he is as conspicuous as ever this summer, and his remarks are quoted as of yore, for be it known, the "Lamb," as he is called, is regarded as a great wit among the fat-heads of society. There is an element of audacity in his jokes which renders them somewhat piquant. They are deemed so brilliant that people quote them in letters sent all the way across the continent. Some weeks ago it was rumored in Newport that a young girl had eloped with a boy of her own age. It was untrue but it caused a great commotion, and Mrs. Fish rushed up to Lehr in an excited manner and asked him why there was so much talk about Mrs. Blank's daughter. "Oh," was the reply, "she's eloped with nothing but a Princeton freshman and a pink chiffon hat." One day he was seen at the water's edge, cautiously putting a toe in and promptly drawing it out. He was asked if the water was cold. "No, but it's so salty and I'm so fresh," he replied. From the quality of the Lamb's jokes it is seen that his admirers are easily amused. He has long filled the role of jester for such women as Mrs. Fish and Mrs. Astor. Mrs. Fish, by the way, has a keen sense of humor herself. When told several months after Lehr's marriage that the stork was soon to visit Mrs. Lehr she exclaimed, "Impossible!"

Society Cold-Shouldered

The James L. Floods have gone abroad for a protracted stay. Ever since the marriage of the Floods society has been waiting for them to give some big entertainments. It was supposed by many people that Mrs. Flood was socially ambitious, and that she would undertake to dazzle them by the splendor of her entertainments and the lavishness of her hospitality. This supposition was based upon the knowledge that prior to her marriage she had no lofty social connections. The supposition was not well founded. Mrs. Flood has tastes akin to those of her husband, and she is of a domestic nature. The frivolities of the fashionable herd hold no lure for her. Mr. Flood loathes society, its hypocrisy and its shallow pretensions, and he is proud of his wife, and she appeals to his admiration largely because of her devotion to her home and her aversion to the phantom glory to be achieved in the social whirl. She is essentially a wife and mother, and is never so happy as when quietly spending the summer months in her picturesque home among the beautiful redwoods of the Santa Cruz mountains. Of course if the Floods cared to entertain the snobs of the smart set would be falling over one another in their efforts to get inside of the stately and sombre brown-stone mansion on Nob Hill.

Artifices of Imprisoned Fiends

The case of Roberts, the Folsom escape who was caught by the pursuing posse near Davisville, where he loitered to satisfy his uncontrollable desire for opium, directs attention once more to the extremes to which convicts will go in order to obtain their beloved drug. As is well known there are all sorts of underground methods by which the narcotic is smuggled into the two State prisons. To stop this traffic was one of the hardest problems Warden Aguirre had to tackle when he took office. As fast as he destroyed one route the artful convicts would devise another till it seemed there was no limit to their cunning. Finally, just as he thought that he had succeeded in blocking all routes, he learned that several of the oldest "fiends" were still receiving the contraband drug through some mysterious channel. He watched everything that they received and presently reached the conclusion that they received it in their laundry. Their "wives" had been allowed to do this work for them outside the prison walls. One day he confiscated some of the laundered articles just as the "wives" handed them through the gate. He examined them carefully, but not a trace of opium could he detect. He was baffled till the idea came to him to hand the clothing over to a chemist. Then the secret came out. The "wives," after washing the linen taken from the prison, soaked the handkerchiefs in a solution of opium. The handkerchiefs were then dried and carefully ironed. Handed in through the prison gate they were as innocent a looking lot of handkerchiefs as ever passed that vigilantly guarded portal. The opium fiend who received them simply soaked them in a cup of water and drank the solution.

A Hot Time at the Dell

In England they are still discussing the impropriety of "mixed" bathing at summer resorts, and at many of the watering places in Europe men and women are never permitted to mingle in the surf. In this country they not only mingle, but the bathing suit of the feminine swimmer is becoming more beautifully less each season. The sleeveless suit has long been worn, and now the stockingless swimmer is frequently to be seen. Of course a fair swimmer would shock people at Del Monte or Coronado if she went in the surf without hose, but there are other places where the conventions are not so strictly adhered to. For instance at Laurel Dell this year, the Misses Voorsanger, daughters of the Rabbi, disported themselves in the water with bare nether limbs, and occasioned scarcely any comment. However Laurel Dell is not the most fashionable of resorts. This year it was infested by as rough-and-ready a crowd as ever made Rome howl. People who went there for rest and quiet came away very much disappointed. The place is managed by an ex-commercial traveler, and many of his patrons are of that rollicking fraternity. It was a very loud season at Laurel Dell. Many people were there who wonder why they are not popular. It is largely because they are so jolly in their own bold and boorish and familiar way; also, because they are so picturesque in the dining-room. Among them was a rattling funny young lawyer, so mirthful that he took the balls out of the bowling alley one morning early and rolled them down every flight of stairs he could find. He is one of that species of larkish fellows whose spirits are so exuberant that they cannot refrain from trying to amuse others. They are usually successful parlor comedians—in some parlors. In others they are regarded as pests.

The Reason Why

"Billy" Barnes has a bright son, seven or eight years of age, of whom he is very fond. He is an exceptionally handsome lad with an ethereal expression in his big black eyes, and he is as ingenuously frank as he looks. A short time ago he met a woman in whom he confided. He told her how much he loved his father and why. It was because papa was very generous to him.

"I suppose he gives you everything you want," said the woman.

"Yes," said the lad; "he gives me everything my mother doesn't want him to give me."

"But if she knew then he wouldn't give them to you," she said.

"Oh, yes he would," was the quick rejoinder, "that's why he gives them to me."

How She Earned Her Title

So ex-Governor Murphy of Arizona and his wife are going to separate. An inkling of this state of affairs got out some time ago but close friends of the couple promptly declared that the differences would be patched up and the case never get to the courts. The Murphys cut quite a figure among the Arizona elect. Mrs. Murphy was always a particularly interesting and entertaining woman. She was born in the territory, absorbed its coloring, and a most interesting book might be written of her life. In her girlhood life in the territory was chiefly military. Indian and cowboy and she was the heroine in many stirring scenes in those melodramatic times. She was strikingly handsome as a girl, a beautiful figure on horseback and the most daring woman rider in a section noted for fine horsemanship. Her father was a big stockman, entertained on a lavish scale and of course his four beautiful daughters were not the least of the attractions around his splendid hacienda. But Miss Nellie was easily the leader in everything. The settlers called her "Bronco Nell" and the way she won the title was characteristic. She invariably invited a suitor to take a horseback ride with her and two kicking ponies from her father's band were always led up for that purpose.

She and ex-Governor Murphy have been married for some fifteen years. They have one child, a son. The three sisters of Mrs. Murphy all married prominent men. One of them, Mrs. Oliver, was at one time engaged to Major Rockefeller who disappeared so mysteriously in the Philippines, but her untimely death ended their romance. Another sister married Marion, an influential newspaper publisher and a very close friend of General Crookes at the time that officer was doing such effective Indian fighting in the Territory. The third sister is the wife of a millionaire Arizona mine owner named Wells. Oaks Murphy is fairly well fixed in this worlds goods, as he has been let into several of the successful ventures of his brother, who is a millionaire many times over. At present he is managing a railroad for this same brother. The latter was started on the road to fortune through the friendship of "Diamond" Joe, but that is another story.

The Personality of an Author

The portrait of Miss Gwendolen Overton, in the current Bookman, was done by Anna Desmond of Los Angeles, and has caught the pose and expression of its subject very well. Miss Overton is not a handsome woman, nor has she a graceful figure, but there is something rather French about her that unconsciously makes one think of Madame Recamier or Madame de Stael. Though the author of "Anne Carmel" has lived in Los Angeles for many years, Miss Overton is not a Californian. She was born at Fort Hayes, a wild western army post, and spent the greater part of her childhood and early girlhood in Arizona and New Mexico, the localities her first novel and most of her short stories so picturesquely describe. Colonel and Mrs. Overton spent two years in Washington when Gwendolen was about twenty. She has mingled with cultured people all her life, and some years spent in France were of great benefit to her for she became familiar with the best minds in French literature. Miss Overton is not all "booky," but is passionately fond of riding, driving and boating, though in appearance she is not at all athletic.

The Ideal Shoulders

Oscar Maurer, the artist-photographer, bewails, I am told, the scarcity of the old-fashioned sloping shoulders among our society belles, and I have heard that he has a model whose shoulders he tops with the faces of some of his fashionable patrons who sit to them. The same practice, I believe, is resorted to by miniaturists and portrait painters. The average American woman does not possess ideal shoulders, which are those of Raphael's "Fornarina," and not one woman in a thousand among our society or stage beauties possess shoulders of that type. Dolly Madison had them and the Empress Eugenie's are of the sloping variety. One seldom sees them in a San Francisco ballroom. Mrs. Joe Tobin's are square and so are Ethyl Hager's and Therese Morgan's. Miss Alice Rutherford, daughter of Mrs. George Crocker, is one of the few young women I know who can boast of the ideal shoulder, but in this prosaic age of golf and tennis one should not expect to see the graceful curve on the average athletic American damsel. The styles have changed since the days of Raphael, and the ideal young woman today does not droop at the shoulders. Swinging the golf-club and wielding the tennis racquet develops muscle rather than gentle curves.

Money Making the City Grow

An indication of the lusty business life now animating what the newspapers delight to call the New San Francisco is the Kelly & Liebes sale of the ten years' lease of the building at the southeast corner of Post and Kearny streets to Kohler & Chase for thirty thousand dollars. The big music establishment thought it must have a store on the line so it was very well satisfied to pay three thousand dollars a year for the privilege of paying rent there. Kearny street, by the by, is looking up all along its length through the business section. Several years ago it was pronounced "dead" north of Sutter street, but all the long vacant, "late lamented" buildings in that section have taken on up-to-date paint and patched up their interiors and, notwithstanding their ancient style of accommodations, are finding tenants at double the rentals of five years ago. No longer may the silurian wail, as he did through the dull times, "After 7 p. m. a cannon-ball might be fired down Kearny street without hitting a single pedestrian." Verily, the city do "grow."

Smart Women Will Wear "Ahems"

My New York correspondent writes me that women with unshapely nether limbs will have no show at all this fall. The new tailor gowns are built so tight that they resemble trousers, and the skirts don't touch the ground. There is not the ghost of a flare, and you must have well-formed feet as well as legs if you want to wear the twentieth century skirt and be in style. Wide bands heavily stitched down each seam add to the trouser-like effect, and no wrinkle must appear anywhere. It sounds very fetching and should look well on some of our athletic girls—but heaven help the others! To contrast with this out-door costume, the new ball-gowns and reception costumes have skirts so betrimmed that the foundation is scarcely visible, and the figure beneath is completely lost sight of. Artificial flowers are the proper garnishing, so say the London modistes, for ball gowns. Miss Knight wore one of these flower-trimmed gowns in "The Climbers" and it was very effective.

One of the latest absurdities cabled from Rome is that Dr. Mazzoni, who attended Pope Leo, was born a Catholic but is now an atheist and high up in the Masonic order. Dr. Mazoni may have been born a Catholic, but he is not a Mason and an atheist.

Have Bet on the Outcome

The annual differences in opinion over the way the money should be raised to conduct the State Fair flamed up last week in a sporting bet of one hundred dollars a side between Harry Lowden, acting secretary of the State Agricultural Society and B. W. Cavanaugh, the well known hop-grower and bookmaker. According to the law the Agricultural Society is forbidden to use any of the money for horse racing that is given it by the Legislature. To raise the wherewithal for this purpose it annually has recourse to selling the betting privileges of the ring. The bookies and poolsellers get the money out of the public and they dislike exceedingly to hand over too big a percentage of it to the Fair management, and there's the rub. Last year these betting privileges netted the society thirteen thousand three hundred and thirty-six dollars, but as the directors paid out twenty thousand and ninety dollars in purses there was a deficit of six thousand seven hundred and fifty-four dollars, a result which led to a heated discussion among those most interested as to the best way of conducting the meeting on a sound financial basis in the future. This annual question is always a hot one. Acting Secretary Lowden is a rampant opponent of the betting syndicate's method of hooking the persimmon. In the height of his argument with Cavanaugh, last week, he wagered one hundred dollars that the Agricultural Society can easily obtain sixteen thousand four hundred dollars for the privileges of an open betting ring and thereby not in any way be dependent on the sydicate. Bookmaker Cavanaugh pooh pooed any such hope and stoutly declared that the Association could not raise any such sum of money either from the syndicate or from an open betting ring. Lowden is thoroughly warmed up over the dispute for he claims that at no time under syndicate methods has the Agricultural Society received a fair price for the betting privileges. He has the balance sheets to show a loss to the society and unfair prices to those who have gone against the books. He cites the last spring meeting held at the track by the Sacramento Jockey Club when the bookmakers paid all the purses and all the attendant expenses with a free gate.

Brigandage in the Mountains

The grandeurs and glories of the Sierra Club's outings have furnished a theme for many magazine and Sunday supp. writers, but none of them ever remarked the indifference of the members of that organization to the distinction between meum and tuum. A traveler who went into the King's river country for his vacation at the same time the Sierra Club made the trip and over the same route complains to me that the doings of some of the club members savor of Sicilian brigandage. He says that they were short of provisions and that they organized marauding bands to plunder other travelers. And, though they are popularly believed to journey on foot, when they reach the mountains they press live-stock into service without regard to ownership.

Pioneered Theatre Parties

Though he escaped the attention of the sleuths on the dailies, Robert Brereton Maitland, who recently visited San Francisco after a long absence, could have contributed some interesting interviews. He it was who in the halcyon '70 period introduced to society the custom of giving the theatre and supper parties that have continued in favor ever since. Maitland was a prominent figure in the social and business world in the years preceding the failure of the Bank of California. Coming here on his way home to London, England, from India, he remained to build some irrigating canals in the San Joaquin valley for William C. Ralston and other capitalists. He also took time to fall in love with and marry a pretty San Francisco girl of good family. By his marriage Maitland became a family connection of Mrs. Moor, wife of Captain Moor of the Pacific Mail, Mrs. Hartshorne, wife of Captain Ben Hartshorne of the California Steam Navigation Company, Henry and Ed. Norton, John Lord Love and his sisters, the wives of William and Fred Foster who accumulated fortunes in the Oriental trade.

A Wedding Reminiscence

Apropos of the Love sisters, it was at the wedding of Leila with William Foster that a bit of society pilfering occurred which was much discussed by the tabbies of that time. An advertisement appeared in the papers the day after the event which read:

Taken by mistake from the ladies' dressing room at the wedding last night, an ivory backed hairbrush, and a packet containing three point lace handkerchiefs; please return—no questions asked.

History does not relate whether they were sent back or not.

Mills as a Statistician

W. H. Mills has been distinguishing himself again; this time as a statistician. He is a very remarkable man, and can quote figures with cheerful inaccuracy whenever it is necessary to bolster up a lame but specious argument. At a recent dinner of the Merchants' Club Mr. Mills made a speech in which he had occasion to quote many figures relative to the populations of different countries and exports and imports and upon these he based an argument which pleased him. Then he sat smilingly down. The next speaker was a bullet-headed gentleman who cannot make an effective argument, but who is up in some figures. He was foolish enough to get angry at Mr. Mills, thereby losing several points. He said, "I do not know the exports and imports of these special countries which Mr. Mills has been giving, but I do know their population, and if his other figures are as inaccurate"—then he snorted. Everyone laughed, Mr. Mills most of all, for all of the clever gentleman's friends know that he manufactures figures just for fun, and anyway his statistics prove as much as statistics ever do, which is nothing at all.

Mrs. Georgie Hopkins McNear is wearing the swellest thing in stork-coats that has been seen this season. It is a navy-blue silk coat, a trifle over three-quarter length and accordion-pleated. Both Mrs. Gus Taylor and Mrs. Fred McNear have always been partial to blue of all shades. and the latter has nearly all her gowns of that color.

The Two Maries

The friends of Mrs. Truxtun Beale are looking forward to a visit from her within a month. She has written out that she had a grand time in Europe, and that she has several trunks full of Paris frocks. The impending return of the Beales has renewed speculation as to whether the sisterly intimacy that so long characterized the relationship between the two Maries will be resumed. They had been inseparable so many years, that many people were astonished that Marie Wells did not accompany the bride and groom on their European trip. Indeed her failure to do so excited considerable gossip, and for a time currency was given to the rumor that the bond of friendship had been severed. Miss Wells has no doubt greatly missed the companionship of the other Marie, for she has taken no active interest in social affairs since the marriage.

Byron Springs has been one of the most popular places for rest-seekers this summer. Among the late visitors there were Major and Mrs. C. C. Clay, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Steindorff, Rabbi M. S. Levy, Mrs. E. W. McKinstry and Mrs. C. H. Hedges, Dr. C. A. Buckel and Dr. Sarah Sherry of Oakland, Dr. and Mrs. P. F. Casey of San Quentin.

Capitola is still the haunt of the Izaak Waltons who spend long hours trolling for salmon or dangling the seductive trout fly. Capitola had more visitors this season than during any previous year and the rush continues.

The News Is Not New

The announcement in the Examiner that Miss Joan Hadenfeldt has decided to go upon the stage did not surprise readers of Town Talk. Several months ago I wrote of the dramatic aspirations of the young woman. At that time she made all preparations to debut with the Neill company, but at the last moment les pieds froids interposed. Miss Hadenfeldt has long been within the public eye. She has for years been a fertile and easy subject for Sunday supp. writers, being full of fads concerning which she gladly took the public into her confidence. Kind-hearted and gracious, she let immature writers picture her in all sorts of poses to adorn supplement pages and swell the purses of the scribblers. Her sister Wanda, who is as beautifully blonde as Joan is beautifully brunette, often figured in the pictures and stories. Joan posed for the Call once in the costume of Pauline Bonaparte. When the Hadenfeldt girls built a house on the beach for themselves, that was another item for a newspaper page. Joan was once nearly scalded to death in her bathtub, and only her presence of mind saved her from being hideously scarred for life. How she ordered oil to be rubbed into her burns, and the rest of her precautions were described in a sensational illustrated article a week or so later. At one of the Bohemian Club art exhibitions the portrait of "Miss H," a dashing study in red, provoked much comment. It was half-toned in the dailies and there was some speculation as to the model. But the in cog was not preserved. The subject held an animated reception before her portrait at the opening matinee, and visitors to the exhibition were thereby permitted to judge for themselves whether Miss

Joan Hadenfeldt looked like her picture. She is a perfect specimen of physical beauty, a Juno in build and a Diana in temperament. Rea's Characteristic Roar

James W. Rea, capitalist and political boss of San Jose, is roaring mad. Mr. Rea roars whenever there is interference with any of his pet schemes. He is president of the San Jose and Los Gatos Interurban Electric Railway which is now under construction It is completed from the city limits to the pretty little village of Saratoga. The company has been prevented from extending its lines within the city limits because it has not been able to secure a franchise. Twice within the past few weeks Rea has been granted the franchise but each time it was found that the grant was defective. Monday was the day set for the third selling of the right of way and Rea bid one hundred dollars for it. There were others in the council meeting who were interested in the franchise, and who soon manifested a lively interest in the bidding. Attorney William Beggs raised the bid the required ten percent. Rea scowled at Beggs and bid another ten percent. Beggs came back with another bid. Up it went from three figures into the thousands. Rea began to paw the floor. Beggs smiled. Rea pulled his hair and swung his arms and roared his bids with a voice that shook the building. Mayor Worswick and the councilmen sat and looked pleased, for they saw the city coffers filling rapidly. Beggs bid four thousand nine hundred dollars and Rea, with a defiant glare, raised it to five thousand three hundred and ninety. Beggs smilingly took his hat and left the room. The indignant boss declares that he was tricked by his enemies, who knew that he would outbid all competitors whatever the cost, because his new road would be worthless without a line through the heart of the city. Others are inclined to believe that Beggs is the agent of the Germania Savings Bank of San Francisco.

Service Gossip

Brigadier-General D. D. Wheeler, recently chief quartermaster of the Department of California, and Mrs. Wheeler are expected to arrive in San Francisco in December to spend the winter here. Captain Harold P. Howard and Captain Ren Smedberg, Fourteenth Cavalry, are among the officers who will probably take station at Fort Riley, Kansas, although there is nothing definite as to this, the future stations of the regiment not having been determined. Lieutenant-Colonel George Andrews of the Adjutant-General's Department has been promoted to the rank of Colonel by the retirement of Brigadier-General J. B. Babcock, who for several years was on duty at department headquarters in this city. Captain Bugge, Twenty-eighth Infantry, who arrived from Manila last Friday, served in the Philippines as aide to General Davis, who before his retirement was commanding general of that department.

Brigadier-General C. A. Coolidge was the guest of honor at a reception given at the Presidio Monday evening, at the quarters of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Woodbury, who succeeded him in command of the Seventh Infantry stationed at that post. The reception was to mark the promotion and retirement of General Coolidge from the service of Uncle Sam, and it was made the occasion for the presentation of a silver loving cup to the general from his late brothers-in-arms.

Doing the American Kow-Tow

Americans abroad seem to imagine that the chief purpose of the diplomatic service of the United States is to procure for them, from the Governments to which these Ministers and consuls are accredited, various courtesies, social, political and personal.

As our diplomatic service is the direct efflorescence of our fertile and beauteous political system, it is frequently difficult for the ministers and consuls to dodge the peremptory demands upon their influence at court, backed as these demands very often are, by the "requests" of politicians and statesmen whose wishes may not always be disregarded without incurring perilous risks.

The legation of the United States at Peking is not so far out of the beaten track of the globe-trotting American that it is entirely free from the annoyance of the ward politician of Duluth or the boss of a Senatorial district in the metropolis of the State from which the touring American hails.

Particularly onerous are Mr. Conger's duties when he is called upon by a man like Senator Beveridge of Indiana to "arrange an audience with the Emperor, the Empress Dowager, and Li Hung Chang."

This demand in the shape of a telegram from the Senator was actually received by Minister Conger during the Indiana statesman's whirlwind tour of the Orient last year.

The impossible character of the order was recognized at the legation and no immediate notice was taken of it.

One day a man dressed in a frock coat and a slouch hat blew in through the main gate of the legation compound and announced himself as—

"Senator Beveridge of Indiana, sir."

As he shook hands with Minister Conger the Senator made inquiry:

"Received my telegram, I presume?"

To which Mr. Conger answered: "Yes, Senator, I received a telegram from you."

"All arranged, then, I suppose?" the orator asked.

"Nothing has been arranged."

"What! nothing? You received my telegram, didn't you?"

"Oh, yes, I received your telegram, but the audiences you ask for are positively out of the question. It is barely possible that we may procure an interview with Li Hung Chang for you, but that is all."

"And when can I see Li Hung Chang?" the Indianan inquired.

"Some time tomorrow—perhaps."

"Tomorrow! That will be too late. I leave Peking tomorrow."

"Well, we will try to bring you together tomorrow morning." And with this promise, Senator Beveridge had to rest content.

The negotiations for this audience with the Chinese statesman were successful, for Li Hung Chang had traveled and was more or less familiar with the American idiosyncrasy. He entertained Senator Beveridge as cordially as the American would permit, but it is on record in the social annals of Peking that the Prime Minister was not able to get in a word edgewise. Senator Beveridge was chock-a-block with knowledge of China and her affairs and especially of all matters pertaining to China's foreign relations, gathered in a two weeks' sojourn in Shanghai and Hongkong, and this was his opportunity for unloading his accumulated wisdom upon a poor, helpless old man, coupling every fact of politics and history with sage advice and sapient commentary.

Fortunately for the Senator he asked no questions. His monumental conceit towered too high for interrogatory. If he had asked a question of this astute Chinaman Senator Beveridge would have fallen into a bottomless pit, for Li Hung Chang would have seized his favorite opportunity and answered Senator Beveridge's question with another, and another, and still another. Then the flood of inquiry would have overwhelmed the Senator and Li Hung Chang would have added another scalp to his belt, to companion the scalps of a hundred inquiring journalists and the scalps of a thousand unwary statesmen of every nation on earth.

Another breezy American received at the Peking legation was Commissioner Barrett of the St. Louis Exposition. Mr. Barrett also demanded an audience with the Emperor and the Empress Dowager, and he was laughed at behind the tapestries as Senator Beveridge had been laughed at.

He was quietly but confidently informed that the Son of Heaven and the Dowager of the Great Pure Dynasty were not in the habit of receiving representatives of fairs and trade conventions.

But Commissioner Barrett is a trained journalist and knows the game better than it is known in Peking. He sent in his card inscribed "Ex-Minister to Siam," and was received with all the honors. At the Court of Heaven no distinction is made between one who is and one who has been. Then the laugh was on the wise people who dwell in the American legation.

The severest trial that has afflicted the American legation at Peking followed immediately upon the arrival in the Chinese capital of General Miles and Mrs. Miles. Ordinarily it would not be necessary to mention the arrival of Mrs. Miles, but the sequel will demonstrate the importance of Mrs. Miles as a part of the Miles entourage while traveling in foreign parts apropos of nothing in particular.

Of course it was incumbent upon Mr. Conger to arrange an audience with the Emperor for General Miles—this was a courtesy in proper order due the commander of the American army. Otherwise there was no more reason why General Miles should kow-tow before the Emperor of China than that the same obeisance should be performed by Senator Beveridge or ex-Minister Barrett. It is not probable that the Emperor had ever heard of General Miles, and it is more than probable that Prince Ching had great difficulty in explaining the etiquette peculiar to this especial audience.

Everybody went to the audience in chairs. It was a numerous party for many people happened to be quartered on the legation at that time and each person residing as a guest in the legation was entitled to an invitation to the royal function. Each chair cost Mr. Conger ten taels.

Then ensued the extraordinary spectacle of an audience by the Empress Dowager to Mrs. Miles. There was even less reason why Mrs. Miles should be received at the Chinese court than was apparent for the reception of General Miles, but nobody looks for reasons when the Empress Dowager is on exhibition—transient Americans in Peking are not favored with royal audiences every day and to inquire the reason for this unbending of Oriental royalty in the presence of these representatives of the fiercest democracy on earth would have savored of ingratitude.

The chairs were again ordered and the legation once again passed the Heavenly Gates of the Forbidden City. As it is necessary for those presented to the Empress Dowager of China to back down from the throne after the kow-tow, the women on this occasion took the precaution to wear their shortest dresses—genuine court gowns with the regulation trains would have involved the risk of the fall that is said to accompany pride.

Following these audiences came dinners at the legation in honor of General Miles, and other dinners in honor of Mrs. Miles. Plates were never laid for less than twenty-four guests, and each plate was money out of the pocket of Mr. Conger. It is estimated that General Miles and Mrs. Miles cost Mr. Conger fifteen hundred dollars, American gold, five hundred of which was paid for the chairs in which the legation trotted to the royal audiences.

The American Government very sensibly reserves nothing for this sort of thing, so that Mr. Conger cannot emulate the example of Henry T. Scott, whose bill of three thousand dollars for entertaining President McKinley is still a theme of sarcasm in the mouths of the citizens of San Francisco.

Consul-General Wilcox of Hankow is the antithesis of Mr. Conger. Dr. Wilcox never entertains anybody. He was once asked why and answered, "I never give and I never take." In consequence Dr. Wilcox is the most unpopular consul in the Far East.

In Hankow there are only seventeen Americans at the present time, and this forlorn group of exiles sought to celebrate the Fourth of July on board a gunboat that happened to be in the port. Dr. Wilcox was invited but as it rained on the Fourth the Consul-General offered that as an excuse for not attending the celebration. The Americans afterwards visited the consulate and stayed long enough to eat a slice of cake and drink something that Dr. Wilcox assured them was a mint julep. Then the Americans invited the official representative of their country to dine with them in the evening, but the Consul-General again declined the invitation and the day closed in gloom and despair.

It is said that Dr. Wilcox is the only official in China who has demanded that an American shall identify himself as such by his passport. It is also said that he refused to register a naturalized American citizen of German extraction, and the applicant was compelled to secure registration at the German consulate before he could do business with the Chinese of Hankow.

Possibly there are people in the United States who are wondering why American trade is not making greater headway in the valley of the Yangstze. In justice to Dr. Wilcox it may be said that he is not the only American consul who would serve his country better within the national boundaries. There are many others, pitchforked out of the political obscurity of Oshkosh and Snohomish into the calcium that glares down upon a diplomat, who should be recalled and their places supplied by business men and enterprising officials capable of advancing the material interests of the United States in foreign parts.

Hankow, July, 1903. —The Wanderer.

From a Jail-Breaker's Log

July 4:—We had an extra good dinner today. I wish the rest of my family were as well fixed as I am. If my father had only known what's what, he would have educated my brothers differently. Instead of teaching them that honesty is the best policy he would have taught them the reverse. One of my brothers carries a hod and the others are carpenters. None of them knows what it is to enjoy the luxuries of life. For my part, I have lived on the fat of the land since I was fourteen. "Incorrigible," I was called, and they sent me to the reform school. There I learned what it is to live on government fare, and not to have to work for it. I have lived up to my knowledge ever since, and life's gone easy with me. The man who isn't afraid of jail has a priceless possession. Jail is a mighty good place.

July 6:—There's a plot to break away, and I've been asked to join. This is a model jail, run on humane principles. Philanthropists wax enthusiastic over us. All the star criminals have had their pictures in the papers. Mine went in. I looked handsome and well-fed, and I hope mother and the boys saw my phiz. It may teach them a thing or two about the evils of too much morality. I'm not sure I want to break out of here. What's the use? I am sure of three meals a day and a soft bed, and we have more liberty than an ordinary hard-working mortal who has to get in eight or nine hours a day in labor, and support a family. My wife and children are well cared for. Some rich ladies are educating the kids, and are glad of the chance to do a philanthropic stunt. Why should I deprive them of their blessed privilege?

July:—It's all arranged. We're to break out tomorrow night. We are all armed. It is a part of our day's work to shoot at targets. Besides that we play golf and tennis and have our mashies and racquets to help out, not to speak of the bats of the base ball players. The Warden is afraid of powder. He was burned once with a firecracker, and has been timid at powder ever since. The guards are fat and lazy and over-fond of booze. I don't think they'll give us much trouble.

July 20:—It was easy enough. We're all out now. All we had to do was to point our guns at the Warden.

"Don't fire," he cried, and cowered behind a pile of jute bags, "don't please, fire!"

That's your fire-eater for you. I felt kind of sorry for the poor chap, and if the other fellows hadn't been so blood-thirsty I'd have been willing to move on without shooting. But they wanted to let fly a few bullets. They killed a cow, a hen and two guards, beside the cook. Then we stopped and packed up a good lunch with several bottles, went into the storeroom and unearthed some clothes to don instead of our stripes, and moved on. I stopped and phoned to the Sheriff that there'd been a jail break and if he wanted to win his spurs he'd better be getting a move on. Then I sent a message to a San Francisco newspaper giving full particulars. I have a friend on the paper and it was my chance to do him a good turn by giving him the scoop. One of the boys wanted to stay awhile and see what the Sheriff thought of it all, but we concluded it would be better to listen to his comments from the shelter of the trees and rocks in the mountains. I'm almost sorry to leave the old jail. But I'll do my best to get in again. A jail-break once in a while may vary the monotony of life, but I never cared for strenuous labor. —The Josher.

Automobile Topics

The great automobile tournament at Monterey was the talk of automobile circles during the week. It was a highly successful affair from beginning to end, and did a great deal toward promoting interest in the industry. Not the slightest accident marred the pleasure of the pastime, a circumstance that caused considerable surprise among people who had been laboring under the delusion that the auto is a deadly toy. The tournament afforded a valuable object lesson in the progress that has been made in perfecting the auto, and many people who witnessed the races became enthusiastic mobilites on the spot. An incident of the meet was the lowering of the Pacific coast mile record to 1:15 4-5. The results of the races were as follows: Two miles, gasoline machines, for silver trophy—Rambler; time, 3:44. Two miles, open event—White touring car; time, 3:34. Five miles, open event, for silver trophy given by White Automobile Company—White racing machine; time, 8:35. Five miles, open event, for twenty-horse power and under, for National Automobile Company's silver trophy—White; time, 7:44 3-5. Ten miles, open event for Hyde cup—Mors imported racing machine owned by George Whittell Jr.; time, 13:21 1-5; White racer, second. Five miles for gasoline machines, twenty-horse power or under, for silver trophy given by F. A. Jacobs—Winton, owned by F. C. Hotaling; time, 7:40 2-5. Five mile exhibition against time—Mors, twenty-four horse power, French racing machine owned by Whittell. Five mile handicap—Stanhope White, first; actual time, 7:45 4-5.

The White steam carriage certainly made an enviable record at Monterey, for it captured six cups and there were only two which it might have won and failed. It was beaten in the ten-mile free-for-all by a forty-horse power French racing machine which was specially made for the Paris-Bordeaux race. In the five-mile race for machines of twenty-horse power and under, the "White" won each of the two heats, and the final was "White" against "White." The "White" also won the special cup for the fastest mile made during the morning. This showing is all the more remarkable in view of the fact that the machines were not constructed for racing but were ordinary stock cars.

In consequence of a challenge issued by a dealer the National Automobile Company undertook last Wednesday to lower the record of six hours and five minutes from Del Monte to the Examiner office in Oakland. The company sent a two-cylinder Toledo car and a two-cylinder Peerless out to lower the record. The Toledo driven by Mr. Keenan made the run to San Jose in three hours and thirty-five minutes, lowering all records by an hour. He was arrested for speeding by the San Jose authorities or else he would have finished in four hours and forty-five minutes. The Peerless driven by Lon Andrews finished in five hours and fifty-five minutes, lowering the record by fifteen minutes. This machine was delayed fifty minutes by a sparking plug breaking in the cylinder. Both vehicles came through in first-class condition. The Toledo which made the journey was the one which won the hill-climbing contest at Del Monte. Mr. Thomas H. B. Varney, by the way, has bought a Toledo from the National Automobile Company.

Now that John D. Spreckels is a member of the Board of Governors of the California Automobile Club, many of the owners of machines are hoping that he will exert his influence with his brother, Adolph, with a view of persuading the Park Commissioner to secure the removal of unjust restrictions on automobilists. The rule which confines autos to the south drive is without a parallel in the United States. In all other big public parks automobilists have as much freedom as horsemen. Nothing could more eloquently proclaim the provincialism of San Francisco than the rule which bars autos from the main drive in Golden Gate Park.

Four-cylinder cars are growing in favor on this coast. Several orders have lately been placed with local dealers for machines of this class.

Mrs. L. S. King, a sister-in-law of Rollin White, the designer and builder of the "White" touring car, is in San Francisco en route home from Japan. She was seen spinning through the Park and Presidio a few mornings ago. —The Chauffeur

Whittlesey a Real Hero

White Whittlesey has played D'Artagnan in "The Three Musketeers" all this week with a couple of broken ribs. There is a scene where the dashing Gascon dives head foremost from a mimic cabin porthole into the fathomless depths of a painted canvas ocean. It is the duty of the property man, a hated but useful functionary, to place a nice comfortable mattress beneath the porthole for the actor to fall upon. His mind was distracted by other duties at Monday's dress rehearsal and the omission of the mattress was only brought to his attention by the ominous cracking of Mr. Whittlesey's ribs when the actor sprawled headlong upon the hard, cold boards. The expressions of regret were mutual, but Mr. Whittlesey's were the more fervid and sincere. The actor has had a fine season at the Alcazar and will take away with him many memories that are pleasanter than those of his week of strenuous and painful efforts in the drama of Dumas.

Walter Bentley, an Australian actor, dissatisfied with his calling, became a preacher and is now at the head of the Actors' Church Alliance in New York. Edwards Davis, a native son, born and bred in Oakland, studied for the ministry and when he had barely attained his majority, spectacularly filled the pulpit of the Central church in his own town. Afterwards he preached in San Francisco. Five years later, preferring, as he expressed it, "to be a sinner and be sincere, rather than a sinful hypocrite," he adopted the stage. All of which emphasizes the self-evident fact that square pegs will not fit into round holes. For several years the eccentric Mr. Davis has played in the East, but San Francisco playgoers have yet to see him. The opportunity will be forthcoming at the Alcazar next week, for Belasco and Mayer have engaged him for the stalwart young lover of "The Dairy Farm." They are shrewd and worldly managers, who do not particularly care what change of profession an actor has made so long as they consider him suited to a particular role which fits his personality. Anyhow, church and stage seem to be getting together.

Avoirdupois No Bar to Political Success

Robert Downing seems not to have been entirely cast down over his financial misfortunes, since he is announced to appear soon in a new political play, "Hon. John North." Downing lost a lot of money in attempting to make his "Voice of the Wilderness" a "go." The play was a remarkably strong one and Downing as John the Baptist did fine work, but alas! he was too much of a heavyweight for the character of the prophet. The public could not understand why a locusts and wild honey diet had the effect of fattening the wilderness hero. Downing not only lost on the "Voice," but he dropped money in his dramatic school. When he first pitched his tent in San Francisco he intended to make his home in California, and opened negotiations with Joaquin Miller for a little house on the hillside, where he expected to spend his non-working days in quiet and mental recreation. But there was no rest here for the actor, and financial reverses disturbed all his plans. He should find a congenial role in his new play, that of a politician who becomes governor of a state. Excessive avoirdupois is not unbecoming in a state executive, however it may be in a prophet of the wilderness.

May Is Up Again

May Buckley's star is again in the ascendancy. From Chicago comes the word that she is to support Dixey in the piece in which he has been pleasing the windy city public for some months. There never was an actress who started out under better stage auspices than May Buckley. Of a theatrical family, she inherited talent and temperament, and in San Francisco—her home—she at once became a favorite. In "The First Born" she won a success that caused the great Belasco to include her in the New York and London company that presented the Powers play. After that Miss Buckley, who is a rare beauty, had no difficulty in obtaining other engagements. But she was fond of a butterfly life, and thought more of having a good time off the stage than of making a great name on it. Her name got into the papers as being connected with a shooting affair in the public room of a restaurant, and a man attempted suicide for love of her. Long before she left San Francisco she had contracted a hasty marriage with a young theatrical man, which I believe did not end happily. It seemed a pity that a woman of such beauty and talent, with such a career before her if she worked a little, should let all her opportunities go for naught. But her friends are rejoicing that May Buckley has pulled up in time, and they feel sure she is going to be one of the most successful of the many successful stage stars that San Francisco has sent East.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

Margaret Anglin, who is going to London after her San Francisco season to appear under Frohman's management, should please the British and doubtless will. Being a Canadian born, she is half-British though it is understood her ancestry is French.

Anita Bridger, who has just dramatized Robert Chambers's "The Maid at Arms," is a San Francisco girl. She made her debut some years ago in this city and afterwards went East, where she made quite a success as an ingenue. She is a beautiful girl, with large, expressive eyes and a charming speaking voice.

"Ben Hur" will not be given here until November but interest in the production is already being shown. Those who saw the play in the East say that it is a magnificent affair.

Ruth White is singing the part of Willie in "The Burgomaster" in Kansas City, at the Grand.

Where Nature is Generous

The true lover of nature is always ready to hie himself to the fields and woods. Her face is always pleasing but he likes to visit her at different times of the year and view her in her varying moods—in the early months, when with new blood coursing through her veins she brings a growing life to plant and shrub, to the grain in the field. the fruits of the orchard and the trees of the forest—as well as in the winter months when resting from her labors she calmly allows the storms to whirl around her. But it is the latter months—August, September, October and November—when in the fullness of her productions and the mellow kindness of her face she appeals to her true lover.

With the ripening fruits—the prune, the olive, the apple, the pear, the grape, in all their various colors, the waving fields of corn, the soothing hop, she fills his lap with her happiness. The winds are hushed and the gentle breezes sing a lullaby. She invites all to taste of what she has so bountifully spread before them, to wander over the hills, to fish in the shady pools, to bring down the deer in his pride and strength, and to boat and bathe in the living streams.

What nature so kindly offers at this season the California Northwestern Railway supplements by giving you the opportunity to take advantage of same, for nowhere on this coast is nature so bountiful, the climate so delightful, the hills and valleys so picturesque, the streams, lakes and rivers so numerous and so well stocked with fish, the deer so plentiful and all so easily reached as along that road. The summer specials continue in effect.

Maude Adams Has Recovered

Miss Maude Adams, who is regarded by many as the foremost actress on the American stage, and who had to retire last year on account of illness, is to appear in a new play next season from the pen of Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett. It was reported that Miss Adams was suffering from consumption, but this was denied and now she is said to have fully recovered her health. Yet some significance may be attached to the fact that she is going to spend some weeks in Denver before her season opens, though manager Frohman says she is going only for the purpose of visiting friends. The play in which she is to appear is a dramatization of "The Pretty Sister of Jose," which was one of Mrs. Burnett's earlier successes. It is a charming story, full of delicate little touches of tenderness and humor. The play will no doubt revive interest in the novel, and no doubt Mrs. Burnett thought of that when she decided to dramatize the story.

The second play of the Miller-Anglin season will probably be Richard Harding Davis's "The Taming of Helen," a play in which two stars have splendid opportunities to shine. The principal feminine role in this play, by the way, in the Broadway production was played by Drina de Wolfe, a former "show girl." Nobody would take Miss de Wolfe's work seriously, though she acted so well, and her former show-girl experience at Mrs. Osborne's playhouse was continually cast in her face. All sorts of ridiculous rumors about Miss de Wolfe's attractions, admirers, gifts and wealth were floated on the Rialto, but Drina repudiated the tales and said her one earnest idea is to become an actress of merit, to win her spurs by hard work.

Alice Treat Hunt, late leading lady of the Alcazar, is playing Rosalind in "As You Like It" in Minneapolis and has pleased the critics and public. Miss Hunt is a really talented young woman and made many friends during her stay in San Francisco. She left here because her husband, Lester Lonergan, wanted her to join his company.

Wallace Munro, manager of "The Cavalier," George W. Cable's play, recently published an ad. for adjuncts to the company, mentioning that "only Southern ladies need apply." Up to date two hundred and ninety-eight Southern girls have climbed the stairs of Daly's theatre in quest of an engagement, one hundred and seventy-two coming from Virginia. Texas sent one, and she got an engagement.

The next symphony concert under the direction of Fritz Scheel and the symphony orchestra will be given at the Grand Opera House on the afternoon of Friday, August twenty-eighth, and the others to follow will take place on Friday afternoons in September and the first two Fridays in October.

Theodore Kremer, who recently offended the Servian authorities by mentioning that he intended to put the late Queen Draga into a drama, is well known here. His first dramatic work was "Church and Stage" on a "Magda" motif, written for Jeffreys Lewis and presented at the old Bush street theatre.

For her opening bill on August thirty-first at the Alcazar Florence Roberts will appear in "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch." She made a great success of this play in her road tour just ended.

Coney Island has just added infant incubators to its attractions. The local Chutes had the incubators months ago.

Cecilia Loftus, who was recently at the Columbia with Southern, is now in vaudeville in Chicago.

The Princess and the Pasteboard Lion

That was one of the cleverest jokes yet promulgated by Fischer's press agent, to advertise the appearance of a one thousand dollar imported lion in "Quo Vass Iss." The ferocious king of beasts turned out to be made of pasteboard and his most ferocious feature is the glare from his big goo-goo eyes. The travesty on "Quo Vadis" gives opportunity for the display of some beautiful costumes but the best part of the new Fischer bill is the second half, the burlesque "The Big Little Princess." Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson have in the latter a delightful song, "You Am de One," and on Monday night they had to respond to several recalls. Nothing could be funnier than Winfield Blake in his juvenile costume. Maude Amber as the star pupil is mirth-compelling and she has an effective song, "De Bugaboo Man." Barney Bernard's best opportunity comes in the Sienkiewicz burlesque as the philosopher, his quaint humor harmonizing well with the part. Kolb and Dill as usual get lots of laughs out of their roles. "Arizona" will be the next bill.

A Realistic Bit

The most realistic bit of acting Central audiences have ever seen was in "Man's Enemy" on Monday night. When Shumer as the villain had to stab Miss Kane, the adventuress, a nervous movement of the latter caused the knife to make a real cut. The thrust drew red blood, but the audience did not know it. "Man's Enemy" is a very moral melodrama showing the evils of dissipation. Mayall as the hero wins the audience's sympathies and they are all glad when they see him turning over a new leaf in the end. Miss Lawton is as usual a sympathetic and lovable heroine.

Physicians Interested in Tyndall's Theories

Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall, the famous psycho-scientist, evidently does not agree with some of the principles of the "New Thought," as it is called. In his lecture at Steinway hall last Sunday night, Tyndall brought out some interesting points regarding the functions of the mind, based upon physiological laws. It is noticeable that there are many prominent physicians among the audiences that attend Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lectures. These lectures seem to fill a long-felt want in that they appeal to the intelligence of the educational and scientific element while expounding the truths underlying mental science. The subject of the lecture tomorrow night will be "The Mastery of Fate."

Frank Bacon, the delightfully droll comedian who has pleased Alcazar audiences for the past three years, will begin a starring tour this coming week in "The Hills of California," a rural comedy written especially for him. He is booked for a tour of forty weeks and will go as far east as Chicago. His company will include Scott Carroll, Milton Ross, Adolph Angus, Roy Stephenson, Ernest Carroll, Gerald Hines, Walter Blake, Gus Tate, Claire Sinclair, Frances Slosson, Jane Weidman, Bessie Bacon and the California quartet.

Features of Next Week's Bills

During the Miller-Anglin season of five weeks at the Columbia there are to be Wednesday and Saturday matinees. There will be no Sunday performances. The organization which this season surrounds Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin, under the management of Charles B. Dillingham, is an unusually strong one, and has been put together not alone for the San Francisco engagement but for a complete tour of the principal cities of the United States. The list of players includes Martha Waldron, Kate Pattison Selten, Victoria Addison, Mary Bertrand, G. S. Titheradge, Morton Selten, Walter Allen, Walter Hitchcock, Robert Mackay, Ralph Lewis, Bertram Harrison, Douglas R. Paterson, Harmon MacGregor, E. J. Mettler and John Tobie. The opening play will be George Bernard Shaw's four-act drama, "The Devil's Disciple."

For G. A. R. week the California will offer Bronson Howard's great war-drama, "Shenandoah." Years have failed to diminish the popularity of this play. The great battle scene as produced by the Neill-Morosco company will be a marvel of stage management. Over two hundred regular soldiers from the Presidio will participate in "Shenandoah," beside a detachment of cavalry.

There'll be another war drama for the Grand Army to enjoy at the Central—"Cumberland '61," by Franklin Fyles. The Cumberland mountains and the West Point military academy figure in the scenery, and there is a bridge-burning episode that is very exciting. The play ends with the wedding of the Union hero and the daughter of the Lost Cause. "Cumberland '61" should crowd the Central all next week.

"The Dairy Farm" will have its first local presentation at the Alcazar, though the piece has a record of immense runs in the East and Chicago. It is an American play of rural life, its scenes laid in New York state in the early fifties. The slavery issue, convulsing the country during the presidential campaign which resulted in the defeat of the gallant path-finder, Fremont, aids the dramatic development of the story. Great pains have been taken to stage "The Dairy Farm" accurately and well, and to reproduce the quaint costumes of half a century ago. In the cast will be several character players who appeared in all the Eastern city runs, among them Theo. T. Rook, Tony West and Helen Hartley.

"In Harvard" is the biggest success yet of the Rogers' Brothers productions at the Grand. It will please our visitors. If the Grand were twice as large it could easily hold the audiences that flock nightly to see these brilliant and humorous productions.

Fischer's has another winner in its new bill and "Quo Vass Iss" and "The Big Little Princess" will run all next week, seats selling well into the next.

The Tivoli will run "The Highwayman" again for G. A. R. week. The vogue of the opera has been enormous.

Heeley and Neely, comedy acrobats, will make their first appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum. Rosie Rendel, eccentric transformation dancer with beautiful costumes, comes directly from London. She comes to this country under a short engagement with the Orpheum Circuit Company. John LeClair, artistic juggler, will also be new here. Elfie Fay will sing new songs, retaining, by request, "The Belle of Avenue A," and Lew Hawkins will give an entirely new routine of stories and parodies. Sidney Wilmer and his company will appear in a new farce, "A Strange Baby."

At the Chutes will be Hodges and Launchmere, a versatile colored couple, in Tyrolean warblings and their famous "Cat Serenade." Lorrain and Howell, comedy sketch artists, Harry Baker, a renowned novelty musician, Jessie Dale, girl baritone in illustrated songs, Mexieas and Mexieas, "the clown and his dog."

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

Pius X a Musical Enthusiast

Pope Pius X, according to the despatches, is a great lover of music and it is his purpose to restore the Gregorian system to favor throughout the Church. He is said to be almost as great an enthusiast as was Gregory I under whose administration the music of the Church entered upon a new period of development. It is to be hoped that this is so, for as I have frequently asserted there is great room for improvement in the quality of church music, especially in the church chorals of the houses of worship of all Christian denominations. It is the boast of Christianity that to her music owed its preservation in the barbarous ages; that she has civilized the savage by means of hymns and that she has taught mankind nothing but love and harmony. Unfortunately she appears to take less interest in music now than in the centuries agone. Music is still a feature of Christian services but it is not what it should be. Pope Pius X may insist upon a higher standard in the choirs of the Catholic churches, and if he should do so perhaps in time it will be possible for a person with a sensitive ear to attend mass without having his nerves racked by strident and raucous voices. Pope Gregory, for whose system the new Pope has so much admiration, was responsible for a new period of development in the music of the Church. To perpetuate his system he established a musical academy at Rome. In the last year of his pontificate, 604, he sent singers to England, and later on monks were commissioned to teach the Gregorian chant in Brittany. The chant as arranged by Gregory assumed the impressive character and the elevated dignity which invest the church chorals with such imposing majesty, and in the liberation of music from the restraints of ancient metre and prosody thus effected, was established its foundation as an independent and unfettered art. The arrangement of the mass has remained unchanged to the present day and so noble and enduring an achievement does it form that it has furnished the inspiration and themes of some of the grandest conceptions and most imperishable monuments with which the perfect art of music has been endowed by its loftiest genius.

Re-enter Herr Scheel

In spite of the mean things certain tradespeople said about Fritz Scheel when he said good-bye to San Francisco the last time, and in spite of other mean things certain musicians did not hesitate to chorus, that same Scheel received a rousing welcome when he stepped into town last week. But then San Francisco is proverbially fickle. What it hugs to its heart one day it cuts dead the next, but is quite willing to repeat the hugging later in the week. Fritz Scheel certainly deserves a rousing welcome from our musical cult. The most successful series of symphony concerts recorded in our history was that which Scheel led. I have often thought that Scheel's physical attributes had much to do with his success. He is a handsome man, tall, dark and distingue in appearance, and his hands—the most expressive part of a baton wielder—are beautiful. A devout symphony matinee girl once said to me: "Usually when I attend an orchestral concert I like to listen with my eyes closed—but I never close them when Scheel leads." This Austrian is a very magnetic man, magnetizing his musicians as well as his audience. He is a strict disciplinarian, and when he first led a mixed orchestra here he had considerable difficulty in making his non-German players comprehend his orders—the same difficulty later encountered by Mascagni with the non-Italians. But they understood the movements of his hands, and it was not long before a complete understanding was established between Scheel and his men. I don't suppose many have forgotten the entree of Scheel to San Francisco. He came here during the Midwinter Fair, and his Imperial Austrian orchestra was one of the biggest attractions of the Vienna Prater. Later he was induced to give concerts in Metropolitan hall, and the Sunday morning sacred concerts became very popular. A Wagner concert given in the evening packed the Temple with an audience that filled every corner of the edifice.

But in spite of fitful successes, financially and invariably artistically, and his appointment to lead the Saturday Morning Orchestra of society girls and the Philharmonic Society of masculine amateurs, many things combined to drive Scheel from us. He has the artistic temperament, and that is about the same the world over. We should try and keep him this time.

Marquardt as Concertmeister

It seems like old times to have John Marquardt as Scheel's concertmaster. Marquardt was concertmaster of the original Vienna Prater organization, and it was during that tour that the first violin fell in love with the charming harpist, Alexandra Breitschuck, who later became Madame Marquardt. Roderman, the flutist, also played in the Imperial Austrian orchestra. When Scheel organized his symphony orchestra, including San Francisco musicians in the band, one of the first to sign was Ernest Schlott, who is one of the finest horn players in the world, but has elected to live in San Francisco for many years, occupying the comparatively humble seat of a Tivoli orchestral player. Herr Stark, of the Zinkand orchestra, who like Scheel hails from Vienna, also played in the first Scheel symphony orchestra here.

Howard Takes the Pas

Formerly "Jack" Parrott took the lead in organizing symphony orchestras here. Parrott helped the Bauer series to success and the Scheel series that came later. This season, while he is on the directorate, it is Shafter Howard who takes the pas of Mr. Parrott. Shafter Howard is a clubman who has written some pretty songs. He is said to combine business ability with his musical talent, and so should be a good promoter of symphony concerts.

A slip last week made me refer to Miss Elizabeth Westgate as the organist of Christ church, Alameda. But Christ church has a vested choir of men and a man organist. Miss Westgate is the organist of the First Presbyterian church, the choir of which consists of Miss Mary Chester Williams, Miss Georgie Cope, Edward Thornton and A. Horatio Cogswell. She also presides at the organ at the five o'clock vespers of the First Unitarian Church, where the Golden Gate quartet sings every Sunday.

Trinity Church choir under Louis H. Eaton's direction has under rehearsal "Light of Life," by Elgar, the new English composer. Mr. Eaton will resume the Sunday afternoon recitals, immediately following the four o'clock service. Next Sunday Mrs. F. E. Wells, of Fresno, a pupil of Mr. Eaton, who has a remarkable contralto voice, will sing "The Ballad of the Trees" and "The Master," by Chadwick.

Grace Cameron, who has been engaged for a leading role in "The Tenderfoot," is a clever little actress and a soprano of talent. She appeared with "The Bostonians" here two or three seasons ago.

Harry Barnhart, the basso, has accepted an engagement as choir director of the First Presbyterian Church in Los Angeles.

WHERE TO BUY CALIFORNIA SOUVENIRS.

Tourists some time ago discovered that the best place to buy pretty and original souvenirs of their visit to San Francisco is Schumacher & Co.'s, the jewelers at 8 New Montgomery street. The souvenirs are principally made of precious stones found on the coast, gold quartz jewelry, etc., and are unique in design and beautiful in conception.

RESERVED-SEAT EXCURSIONS.

On Sunday, August 23d, the North Shore Railroad will inaugurate a series of family excursions to Cazadero and the Russian River redwoods. An extremely low rate will be made for the round trip—only $1.50—and every ticket secured in advance will insure a reserved seat in a special coach. These excursions offer a fine opportunity for a delightful outing in a picturesque country. The sale of tickets begins next Monday at 626 Market street, opposite Palace hotel. Parties of 28 or more may engage a private car.

Reflections of a Managing Mamma

After the Ceremony

Well, thank God, that much is over and I can draw one long breath at last. Heaven alone knows what galley-slave work it is to marry off a daughter, and no thanks for it, either. Cissy may be ungrateful now—children always are—but she will appreciate my efforts some day. I was really afraid that the foolish girl would break down at the last moment, with the trousseau all ready and the breakfast and flowers ordered. Well, she's safely through it now, thanks to my talent for management. Just think of it, Mrs. Richard Rocks with a country house, a steam yacht and money to throw to the birds! To be sure, Rocks is a little off in point of looks, and his habits are not all that could be desired, but then he is rich enough to make up for anything, and I hope Celia won't be mulish. Girls just out of boarding school have no sense, their heads are full of all sorts of silly sentiment. I think they read too much poetry in those places, Shakespeare and Tennyson; it makes them unpractical. Cecelia never quite got over that affair with young Palette, who has not a cent to bless himself with, much less a wife. Dreadful time I had keeping the young fools apart, intercepting letters and all that. Well, the end justifies the means and one certainly has some rights over ones own daughter. Cissy will never know all I have done for her, at least not if I can help it. She never would have consented to marry Mr. Rocks if she did not believe Palette was false to her. Well, he's off in Europe and she's on her wedding trip, thanks, as I say, to my management and mine alone, for Cissy's father is as stupid as an owl when it comes to an emergency. I was afraid up to the very last moment that the girl would enlist him on her side, and then good-bye to my plans. And now for the bills. That's the next worry. It will never do to let Edmund know what all this display cost, dressmaker, caterer, decorator and all. Cissy will have to help me out. She will have plenty of cash, and besides for whose benefit was it all? Not for mine, certainly. Edward wanted a quiet home wedding, but that was never my notion. What is the good of marrying off your daughter in her first season and to the greatest catch in society if you don't make a little display? I hope the papers will give us good notices. I saw that they all got photos, list of presents and description of the gowns and decorations. Everybody said I looked charming in my pale gray, very distinguee and young enough to be the bride's sister. Cecilia was as white as her gown and her eyes were red. It would be just like her if she lay awake crying all the night before but then nobody expects a bride to look her best on her wedding day. Rocks was a little shaky on his legs; I do not doubt that farewell bachelor dinner was somewhat gay. But no matter, everything went off beautifully, and I am the mother of the wealthiest young matron in our set. I hope I shall have equal good luck with Clara, who will be out this winter. And now for the reward of my labors, dinners, diamonds, opera boxes and a trip across the pond. Cissy is too indifferent about such things, but luckily she will have me to coach her, and Richard is very easy to manage; he obeys me like a baby. I hope Cissy will not make difficulties. I intend to be a model mother-in-law; I shall be simply indispensable to my two dear children. With my knowledge of the world I shall know how to smooth over all difficulties and to keep peace in the family. At any rate if Cecelia acts like an idiot I can take her abroad. Travel is a good excuse for anything, and the world is certainly wide enough for both of them; yes, and for young Palette too if it should come to that. My dear children don't know how fortunate they are in having a mamma who is simply devotion itself to their interests. —The Eavesdropper.

The Rev. Mr. Brown—My daughter, don't you ever direct your conversation to something higher than dress?

Miss Brown—Oh, yes; I sometimes talk about hats.

No Further Argument

"I—I may call you Yvonne, mayn't I?" he inquired.

"Certainly not," said Mrs. Fleshleigh. "You have not known me nearly long enough to take such a liberty."

"I'm sure I've known you quite as long as your godfathers and godmothers had when they took the liberty of calling you Yvonne."

And the truth of this ingenious statement of the case was so obvious and incontrovertible that Mrs. Fleshleigh had to let it go at Yvonne, and after that Mr. Freshleigh made very satisfactory headway. —The Josher.

LETTERS

Literature in Capsules

The Designer has a new department entitled "What Women are Doing," in which it chronicles the new and original ways in which women support themselves or add to their pin money. The August number contains the following paragraph:

"The ingenuity of some women is remarkable. A Chicago woman supports herself by reading all the new novels and then telling them to the society women in an abbreviated form, laying stress on the plot and the different characters. She retails one story each sitting, and gives it either to classes or individuals. In this way the society women who do not care to take time to read all the latest novels and yet wish to know all about them may do so with little time and trouble."

The idea is not altogether original with the Chicago woman, since the same plan was in operation in society farther East, and probably still is. The "reader" called upon her clients during the hair-dressing and manicuring hour and placed them in touch with what was going on in the world, as she gleaned it from the morning newspapers, or gave them the outlines of the new books, so that they were enabled to parrot words in order to conceal their lack of ideas. It is a species of what Dooley calls "near-think," and probably passes well amongst a class who all absorb their impressions from the same source. There is not the slightest danger that any one will be caught napping, for all are alike ignorant. However, the paragraph is timely, since it offers an explanation for some of the absurd and preposterous requests made of librarians. A year or two ago one lady was anxious to obtain one of the new books that had "something about moonlight" in the title. That was as near as she could get to a description, and when the list of best-sellers was carefully and critically examined without revealing a single ray of moonlight, some by-chance revealed that she was searching for "When Knighthood was in Flower." Another, who wanted "When You Get It, Keep It," was readily supplied with "To Have and to Hold." Neither is it surprising to have these vicarious readers asserting that "Barabbas" is by the same author as "Quo Vadis," or sending the juveniles of the household to look for "The Heavenly Twins" and "As in a Looking-Glass" for their own delectation. It is only one remove to the book club, where the members pledge themselves to read five minutes a day, and the result of whose labors, as reported in one instance, is to have accomplished the perusal of "Nansen's 'Prisoner of Zenda,'" "Hall Caine's 'Quo Vadis,'" "Allen's 'Christian,'" "Hawthorne's 'Choir Invisible'" and "Hope's 'Farthest North.'" Another sample of literature in capsule doses was reported from a summer hotel, where a parlor lecturer descanted on Charlotte Bronte before a select society audience. At the close of the discourse, a beautifully gotten up woman was heard to deliver herself thus: "Well, wasn't she good! I know a lot about Charlotte Bronte now, but who was this Jane Eyre she talked so much about?" We are fast getting back to elements and first principles. From being too indolent to do a thing to being too indolent to learn how to do it is but a short half-step. In another generation we shall have reached the point where only those who must use reading as an adjunct to the gaining of a livelihood will learn to read. Meantime, our Chicago woman who retails the latest novels to her select audience, instead of having evolved something altogether new, has simply taken over the old Oriental occupation of the story-teller.

Evidently Anthony Hope does not carry the lines of his principal calling in his face, judging by a story which is going the rounds of the English periodicals. A young lady who was his partner at dinner once told of their conversation, which she did her prettiest to make entertaining. Asked afterwards if she had talked about books at all she replied, "Oh, dear no; Mr. Hawkins wasn't that kind of a man at all." No doubt Mr. Hawkins was relieved at the respite, but the young lady escaped her ordeal much better than did one who was assigned to the keeping of Wilkie Collins, but who failed to understand his name, or to identify her escort with the novelist. Whichever way it was, she expressed her opinion that his books were detestable, and Mr. Collins agreed with her most cordially. Afterwards she mentioned the matter to her hostess, and was duly enlightened, if not edified.

McClure's manages, by hook or by crook, to get possession of all the best stories of children. There were Josephine Daskam's, to begin with, and then Mrs. George Madden Marten came with that most lovable little girl, Emmy Lou. Scarcely had the series ended when the editors discovered Myra Kelly, with her little East Side Israelites, and their mixture of utter childishness and world-old knowledge. Empeigh Merwyn gave us a glimpse into the brain of a very tiny girl who chose to endow herself with the preposterous name of "Miss Janumit Latlit," and to build up an environment as absurd as the name, "just a-playing," and now May Kelsey Champion follows close with "The Methods of Charles Stuart York." To these may be added Henry Harland's new novel, "My Friend Prospero," appearing serially, for one of the chief characters is a dear little Italian child, the orphan niece of the parish priest, whose quaint speculations about death and the hereafter are tempered by a healthy material enjoyment of chocolate cigars. The August McClure is a treasure trove of good short stories, and when one finds such an array of names as James Weber Linn, George Barr McCutchin, Henry Harland, O. Henry, George Hibbard, Lincoln Steffens, Stuart Edward White and Doane Robinson, the question arises, how can they do it? No such feast was spread before the magazine readers of a generation back, who were fortunate in finding two or three first-class articles in periodicals which cost three and four times the price of McClure's of today.

Elizabeth Cherry Waltz, the author of the "Pa Gladden" stories which have appeared from time to time during the year in the Century, and which will be issued in book form in time for the Christmas trade, is the literary editor of the Louisville Herald. —The Bookworm.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Intrusions of Peggy," by Anthony Hope:

We forgive much ill treatment so it is secret; we accept many benefits on the same understanding. To parade the benefit and to let the injustice leak out are the things that make us smart.

Airey Newton: Life has played with you, go and play with it. You may scorch your fingers, for the fire burns; but it's better to die of heat than of cold.

A world of people at once inquisitive and clear-sighted would render necessary either moral perfection or reckless defiance; indifference and obtuseness preserve a place for that mediocrity of conduct which characterizes the majority.

Childwick: In nine cases out of ten the people who are irregular think they ought to be regular, and the people who are regular have established their right to be irregular.

Among the temporal punishments of sin and folly there is perhaps none harder to bear than the necessity of accepting rebuke from unworthy lips, of feeling ourselves made inferior by our own acts to those toward whom we really (of this we are clear) stand in a position of natural superiority.

He meant to run no more risks, to walk no more so near the line, certainly never to cross it. A sinner who has reached this frame of mind generally persuades himself that he can and ought to escape punishment; else where is the virtue—or where, anyhow, the sweetness—that we find attributed to penitence?

A man scorned of his fellows is said to value the society of his dog.

Lady Blixworth: Nothing is more offensive than to see other people despise what you'd give your eyes to have.

Fortunately, emotions primitively barbarous are not indicated by external labels, or walks in the street would be fraught with strange discoveries.

A refusal to betray one friend is usually considered a reflection on the discretion of another. Women are really as bad as men about this.

Trix: Confession and humiliation comfort women when they're in love.

"Have you ever observed that it needs but a perfume, a strain of music, a color, to transport one in imagination to any particular place?"—Marie Bashkirtseff.

Corner of Kearny and Post Sts., to be occupied by a Firm with a History

The striking new building on the corner of Kearny and Post streets is the dead center of the best retail district. It stands diagonally opposite The White House, and is considered the most prominent corner in San Francisco. The securing of the lease last week by Kohler & Chase, the largest music house of the West, created the sensation of the year in real estate circles as well as in pianodom. Kohler & Chase, established in 1850, is the oldest of California piano houses, and one of the most famous musical concerns in the country, with an enviable reputation for honorable, square dealing. It is the intention of this house to use the entire building for its retail department exclusively, and to secure a building in the wholesale district for the accommodation of its immense wholesale and jobbing business. Kohler & Chase are now disposing of their retail stock and it is thought will move about September first.

Why the Veterans Meet

The presence of the hosts of G. A. R. veterans in this city during the week reminds us of the glorious achievements of the Civil war, of the grit of the Nation's defenders and the stubbornness of the gallant foe, of the terrible havoc wrought by the opposing armies in that protracted and brilliant struggle, and the astonishing skill displayed by some of the military captains whose deeds of daring shed immortal lustre on American arms. Incidentally we are reminded that war is not only what Sherman said it was, but that it is also a burden even to the second generation, for if the American soldier is not killed in battle he not only defies time's ravages but actually multiplies until the pension list attains a length that challenges credulity. Many unsophisticated people are curious to know the wherefore of the annual encampments of the G. A. R. The most plausible explanation of the annual gatherings of these perennial heroes is that the people who are taxed to support the ever-increasing pension fund are inclined to grow sceptical. It is deemed advisable to convince them periodically that the men who fought for their country nearly forty years ago are still alive and able to draw their monthly stipend from the Government. Otherwise many people might harbor the suspicion that they were being defrauded by the politicians at Washington, and that the pension roll was stuffed with dummies. At the same time the encampments subserve another and highly patriotic purpose. They call the attention of the youth of the land to the fact that the hardships of military campaigns are conducive to longevity, and that it is especially healthful to suffer some physical affliction in war, entitling the victim to a pension. And after all the patriotic heart is fired with enthusiasm by the spectacle presented by these grand old veterans on parade. They fought for their country and were willing to lay down their lives for it. May they live long to remind us of the spirit of American manhood.

The Press and the Pugilists

Those phenomenally verdant and unsophisticated gents, the sporting editors of the San Francisco dailies, have once more earned the gratitude of a brace of loose-jawed and limber-tongued prize-fighters. For several weeks they devoted themselves to the congenial task of "working up" interest in a prize-ring contest between champion James Jeffries and the erstwhile champion of a remote past, James J. Corbett. Some months ago, when the match was made, people familiar with the fighting qualities of Jeffries and the lack of fighting qualities in Corbett derided the pugilists for their presumption in arranging to fatten their purses by baldly hoodwinking the public. It was generally known that Corbett had not been in condition for a physical encounter for many years, and that he had several times demonstrated his inability to woo from nature the stamina necessary for a severe contest. Moreover it was pretty generally believed that he never possessed the strength sufficient to resist the onslaught of such an abnormally powerful individual as Jeffries. Consequently Corbett was not taken seriously when the match was made. People had come to regard him as a has-been of the prize ring. But mark the influence of the press! Presently the sporting editors began to mould public opinion, and every day for weeks the columns of the newspapers were filled with twaddle direct from the training quarters of the men who were soon to contest for championship honors in the roped arena. In a short time public interest was aroused in the event. The adroit booming it received had the desired effect, and people who a few months before smiled at the prospect of an encounter between the modern Hercules and the spent boxer were feverishly anxious to be at the ringside. Exorbitant prices were charged, but the gullible lovers of the brutal pastime were quite willing to pay them. The contest verified the accuracy of the earlier judgment of the prize ring enthusiasts. Indeed it was such a one-sided affair that it never assumed the dignity of a contest. At no time did the ex-champion seek to recover his lost honors. He opened the exhibition by experimenting with a view of ascertaining how he could receive a blow that would not do him much harm, but which would give verisimilitude to a dramatic climax. He experimented successfully, and when he finally went down from a blow that far from threatened serious results he distorted his face in a way that proved his dramatic training had not been in vain. While resting easily on his knees, and fondling his stomach with his hands, thereby suiting the action to the facial expression like a true histrionic artist, a supernumerary in the wings took his cue and threw up—not a sponge but an article more in keeping with the esthetic character of the occasion. It was a fan. Thereupon the distinguished artist came before the curtain and said a few words. Later on the astute sporting editors, bent upon justifying the reams of twaddle they had previously penned, pronounced it one of the greatest battles Corbett had ever fought.

Wood May Be Investigated

Of President Roosevelt it will probably be said some day that he was at least loyal to his friends. The historian that pays him that compliment will of course cite, by way of evidence of the predominant virtue, his devotion to General Leonard Wood. Roosevelt's exaltation of Wood has provoked harsh criticism throughout the country, but the President is apparently indifferent to public opinion so far as it concerns the favoritism that has been shown the whilom medical officer. Perhaps he believes that loyalty to one's friend is a public officer's first duty to his country. Loyalty to a friend is a virtue that always commands admiration, but it does not justify evil to others that the object of friendship might enjoy emolument to which he is not entitled. In other words President Roosevelt should not be condemned for rapidly promoting his friend Wood providing he did not thereby delay the promotion of others to the high office to which they were entitled by reason of their service to their country. But in jumping Wood over the heads of many gallant officers who have earned the gratitude of their country, President Roosevelt was guilty of cruel partiality. And it is more than likely that he will not be permitted to establish the precedent. Already demand is being made for an investigation by the Senate of General Wood's acts before his confirmation. There are many reasons why such an investigation should be held, but the first and foremost one is that General Wood is under a cloud, and if he is all that his enemies say he is, he is not fit for the high office of Commander-in-Chief of the armies to which he is destined. Unless that cloud be removed he would never enjoy the confidence of the army, and the people of this country do not want a Commander-in-Chief who would be suspected of being an incompetent by the troops he would be called upon to direct in the event of war. There are many things which need clearing up and which Wood and his friends ought to have cleared up. He has been accused of extravagance in Cuba, and of accepting presents from a gambling concern in Havana. His relations with the notorious Bellaire, who was his most faithful and persistent boomer, also needs explanation, as well as his connection with the conspiracy against General Brooke in furtherance of which Major Runcie wrote a magazine article, in which he demonstrated to his own satisfaction the unfitness of Brooke and the supreme fitness of Wood to govern Cuba. Incidentally it would be interesting to know to what extent he was responsible for the ambush into which he led his men at Las Guasimas. Many officers have faced courts-martial for just such mistakes as Wood is said to have committed in Cuba. The ambush was not due to the skill of the enemy but to the fact that General Wood violated every principle of military science, and would have been cut to pieces had not a regular army officer been conveniently near with a line correctly formed. The man who marches his command through an enemy's country and that country a dense mass of undergrowth, in column, is not a skilled officer, even from the standpoint of an untrained volunteer, who learns the value of an advance guard as one of his first lessons.

A Demoralized Army

Since the retirement of General Miles from office people who take an interest in military affairs, and who like to know how well we are prepared for an emergency, are somewhat curious about the plans of the General Staff at the head of which is General S. B. M. Young. Those who are in touch with the army, and who know something of the dissatisfaction and jealousies that exist in army circles, declare that the service is in a badly demoralized condition, and they blame General Corbin for the unfortunate state of affairs. Corbin is said to be one of the cleverest politicians in the country, and ever since the first election of McKinley he has exercised a powerful influence at Washington. He hated General Miles, and it was at his instigation that the Commanding General was sidetracked at the opening of the war with Spain. He has done everything in his power to humiliate Miles, and at the same time he has been most active in strengthening his position in the War Department. General Young, who is now Chief of Staff, is one of his pets, and he will of course be subservient in every way to the arch-manipulator of the great military bureau. Young is a big, bulky, good-natured officer, noted for his courage but not for his knowledge of military science. A few years ago he was a major in the Yosemite Valley. Since the Spanish war he has been jumped over the heads of some very competent officers, and when Miles retired Young was made Lieutenant-General for a week, when he became Chief of Staff. He was given the higher rank so that his pay will be higher when he is retired in January. Young had a good record as a volunteer at the close of the Civil War, but he had risen no higher than colonel of a regiment. After the war he was content to enter the regular service as a second lieutenant. He served sixteen years as captain of a company, and he was not given command of a regiment until the war with Spain. Many of the years of waiting were spent in the Indian wars during which he made a brilliant record. He also won distinction by his work in the Philippines where, despite his bulk, he proved one of the hardest riding cavalrymen in the army. He is not however an ideal man to preside over a war college, but the actual presiding will probably be done by Corbin.

Soliciting the Deacon's Aid

A church located near New York city is in the usual impoverished condition of religious bodies, and the method by which its trustees are hoping to relieve the financial strain is original if not commendable. They have requested that all the saloon-keepers within a certain radius shall contribute the receipts of one day for four successive months to the church treasury. Considering that good church members are expected to shun saloons, and that therefore the church may reasonably be regarded as a detriment to business, the proposition is, to say the least, "cheeky." Why should the saloon-keepers be selected as victims of this arbitrary tax? If the preachers are halfway in earnest in their denunciation of the "rum demon," what business have they to demand a division of profits, even on the basis of three per cent a month for a limited time? Doesn't the proposition savor of blackmail? Will the saloon man whose three per cent foots up to a comfortable amount be given special advantages in the way of advertisement among the elect, or does the pastor of that particular "house of God" propose to use his pull with the Almighty later on? Is the scheme to be worked on the principle of the church bazaar, where every one is expected to attend and to pay ten prices for things they do not want and would not take as a gift on any other occasion? We have grown accustomed to debt-raising schemes which had passed the questionable age and become decidedly off-color. Now the question arises, why the congregations are divided and subdivided and the churches multiplied beyond the ability of those who benefit by them to support their clergymen and maintain their parishes. Why is there not a little common sense and business sagacity applied to church affairs as well as to the other affairs of life? If a neighborbood has one church, one pastor, one Sabbath school, and a united interest, what business has some disgruntled parishioner to set about making a division? Why should some outsider who happens to move into the community and find the particular brand of Christianity which he affects not the one under whose name the church is organized, set himself to split the community into factions and set up an opposition church? Why should some itinerant, casting covetous eyes on the scene, decide to plant himself there and stir up sedition? There is scarcely a community which has not more churches than it can possibly support. In most of our rural communities the beginning usually comes when some philanthropic woman, often the district teacher, opens the schoolhouse on Sunday afternoons and gathers in the children for religious training. The parents follow mainly because it is somewhere to go, and the result is an informal, undenominational meeting. If the majority of the attendants have any special leaning, the form of service is apt to take that direction, but more often the nearest preacher is prevailed upon to make some arrangement by which they profit by his ministrations. At first all goes well. Gradually the funds for a church are evolved and a minister is brought to preside, but before long there is sure to be disruption. Where one church could be sustained in comfort, two, and even three or four struggle along in debt, a drain on the funds of the Church Extension Societies and a burden on the congregations; property is mortgaged and contributions are unpaid. The people who have to dig their living out of the soil soon grow to regard the white-handed ministers as an incubus, and their wives and children, who apparently toil not, neither do they spin, but who seem to be always at leisure, well dressed and well-fed without bodily exertion, are a thorn in the side of the proletariat. With the bitterness that has caused the multiplication of churches comes the obstinacy which will not permit any faction to lay aside the strife and confess itself beaten, and hence the appeals to all sorts of schemes by which to beguile the dollars from reluctant pockets. It has always been an anomaly that though the church has professed such antipathy to the stage there has never been a more popular method of raising money than through the medium of amateur dramatic entertainments, and now, if the saloon keeper is to be called on, "personally and by letter," to make special contributions, it will look very much as though the religious element were not averse to shaking hands with the devil, when no one is looking.

A Crank, but No Genius

Annie Nathan Meyer has a long "appreciation" of Margaret Fuller Ossoli in the current Bookman, but elsewhere in the same magazine there is a decided opposition to her views. Margaret Fuller wrote love letters and her lover, possibly foreseeing the trend of literary taste in this day and generation, was cad enough to leave them so that cupidity minus conscience could turn them into dollars. Mrs. Meyer dilates at great length on the "womanliness" and the longing for appreciation and all that which the writer discloses, and wonders why the world has persisted in regarding Margaret Fuller as an embodiment of intellect when she was all "feeling," but the truth is that the world is not so deeply interested in the little old New Englander. To those who have made her acquaintance only through the vague and indefinite praises of the women's rights leaders there is a feeling that she was a great genius, undeveloped, or unappreciated, or misunderstood, or something they know not what, but to those who have satisfied their curiosity by reading what she wrote and what her contemporaries wrote of her, not always for publication, it is clear enough that she was enormously egotistic and must have been an unmitigated nuisance to the men of intellect to whose train she persisted in attaching herself. Though there is a tradition that she was highly educated and a writer of power, she hardly rose above the level of the Sunday supp. contributor of today. In plain English, Margaret Fuller was an arrogant crank whose eccentricities were sometimes amusing. If she had lived at the present stage of the world's development she would be the president of two or three clubs and the shining light of the woman's page, but as a force in literature or in the development of the age in which she lived she was a cipher. It is refreshing to find a literary journal outspoken enough to say so.

Poison in Food

Periodically our health authorities take cognizance of the fact that dangerous poisons are contained in the milk supplied to this community, and that nearly all canned goods are a menace to the public health. Thereafter, for a short time, there is great activity in health department circles; dairy wagons are raided, and the poisonous jams and preserves sold by our leading grocers are analyzed and condemned. Then our health authorities become curiously apathetic again, and the business of purveying poison in food-stuffs is once more carried on with impunity. This alternate activity and apathy on the part of the public servants employed to safeguard the public health is somewhat suspicious. The sale of adulterated milk is perhaps of all others the most reprehensible since milk is used more largely than any other article of food, and by many infants and invalids—a circumstance which renders even the commonest and most harmless form of sophistication, namely, the admixture of water, a serious offence. Formerly this was the only form of sophistication generally known and practiced, but of late there has been a general increase in the employment of sundry germicides and preservatives, notably borax, boracic acid, salicylic acid and, of late, formaldehyde. Several years ago the laws against the sale of adulterated food-stuffs were rigidly enforced in this city, but now there is a suspicious laxity on the part of the authorities. It is contended by dealers in canned goods that it is absolutely necessary to adulterate them, but they maintain that the substances used are harmless unless taken in large doses. Nevertheless people have a right to know what they are eating, and there should be a law requiring manufacturers of canned goods to set forth upon the label the name of every substance contained in each can and the quantity of each.

Income Taxation

By Jurist.

The next Democratic National Convention will certainly demand the passage of a law taxing incomes above a certain amount, even in the face of the fact that the Supreme Court decisions, as they now stand, have declared such laws unconstitutional. This declaration will call forth the usual hoarse bark of the stipendiary press; "Tray, Blanche and Sweetheart, the little dogs and all" will snap and snarl, as they did when the Chicago platform enunciated the sentiments of the Democratic party upon this important question. Those who recall the utterances of that time cannot fail to remember the stock arguments of that day; first it was an inducement for men with large incomes to commit perjury; again, with a valiant show of bogus patriotism, that "last resort of villains," it was direct effort to tarnish the reputation of the Supreme Court; an effort to soil the judicial ermine and bring the decisions of our highest tribunal into contempt. These hired claquers repeated themselves so often that they began to believe they were really honest, upon that well known Republican principle that "A lie well stuck to is as good as the truth." In view of the fact that such arguments have been made, and will doubtless be repeated, perhaps it would be well, at this time, to give the real facts, which cannot be gainsaid, or denied. Most people, who are honest with themselves, will concede that an income tax is just, upon every principle of right known to political economists. If a rich man will commit perjury for the purpose of concealing his income he will do precisely the same thing to escape taxation upon his other property subject to taxation. This argument is absolutely puerile, but being paid for, is repeated ad infinitum.

The argument that to advocate an income tax is to tarnish the integrity of the Supreme Court is equally without merit. Supreme Judges are after all but men clothed in judicial robes of office; they are moved by the same arguments, subject to the same political bias and susceptible to the same influences as other men. Our Supreme Court is but one of the co-ordinate branches of the government and is forbidden by the Constitution to trench upon the constitutional powers of the legislative or executive departments. When that august body, the Supreme Court, undertakes to assume powers which it does not possess, it is as justly subject to criticism as the humblest citizen in the land. "Judge-made law," which is simply an effort to render nugatory constitutional legislative authority, has always been considered the very essence of tyranny; it was such law that made Jeffries the most infamous character in judicial history, and it was the refusal to make such law at the command of his sovereign even that made Lord Coke one of the brightest luminaries in the judicial firmament. England has for centuries levied and collected such taxes. So thoroughly was the doctrine established that the right to collect taxes upon incomes in England has never been questioned. Our system of laws is founded upon the common law of England, in every State in the Union, with the single exception of Louisiana, where the Civil Law and the Code Napoleon have been adopted. The Supreme Court of the United States is guided or ought to be in its decisions, by the English Common Law and upon the question of the constitutionality of an income tax, has been so guided, until the last decision in the case of Pollock vs. Farmers' Union Trust Company, upon a rehearing. During our late civil war an income tax was levied and collected; if this tax was illegal, then the Government has swindled its citizens who paid the tax and ought in common honesty to refund what was taken without sanction of law. For more than a hundred years an unbroken line of our Supreme Court decisions has been in favor of the legality of such taxes. On August 4th, 1894, Congress passed an income tax law, but in 1895, in the case of Pollock vs. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company et al., the constitutionality of such a tax was questioned in the Supreme Court of the United States. The first argument of the appeal from the United States Circuit Court was had on the 7th, 8th, 12th and 13th of March, 1895. The Court was evenly divided, and upon a well known principle, when such a division takes place, the decision of the lower Court stands affirmed. But the capitalists of the country were not satisfied with this. A rehearing was asked for and granted, and the cause came on for argument in May, 1895. One of the Supreme Court Judges had, in this short interval, experienced a change of heart; a new light had illuminated his befogged mentality, and his next opinion was precisely the reverse of the one in which he had formerly concurred. This sudden and mysterious change of view, which occurs frequently in cases when large interests are threatened, enabled the opponents of the tax to obtain a majority opinion, and the legislative will was swept out of existence by the opinion of a single Judge who had to reverse himself in order to accomplish the desired result.

When the Democratic Convention met in 1896, its delegates logically concluded that if the vacillation of a single Justice could change the whole current of authority since the formation of the government, they certainly could not be censured for adhering to former decisions of the court, so that, in substance, the convention declared that the Democratic party was in favor of an income tax, and insisted that in the event of a Democratic success the personnel of the Court might be changed. In which event the Democratic party would favor the passage and enforcement of another statute imposing a graduated income tax.

As before stated, this declaration was most bitterly denounced; to question the decision was almost treason, and should be condemned by all Republican patriots who were shirking their duties, and leaving the burden of providing revenue to those least able to bear it. These hypocritical tirades had some effect; thoughtless people, not acquainted with the ultimate facts honestly believed that such conduct was unpatriotic to say the least; the large capitalists who had escaped paying their legitimate portion of the expenses of the government were united to a man, even though their immense incomes were directly attributable to "special privileges," granted them by the government. Such bare-faced attempts to deceive honest voters have not often been attempted in political campaigns.

But however harsh may have been the declarations of the Chicago Convention they were fulsome flattery when contrasted with the opinions of dissenting Justices. Justice Harlan of Kentucky, a staunch Republican, and one of the ablest of our Supreme Court Judges, had this to say of his brethren of the majority:

"In my judgment, to say nothing of the disregard of the former adjudications of this court, and the settled practice of the government, this decision may well excite the gravest apprehensions. It strikes at the very foundations of national authority, in that it denies to the general government a power which is, or may, become vital to the very existence and preservation of the Union in an emergency, such as that of war with a great commercial nation, during which the collection of all duties upon imports will cease or be materially diminished. It tends to re-establish that condition of helplessness in which Congress found itself during the period of the Articles of Confederation, when it was without authority by laws operating directly upon individuals, to lay and collect, through its own agents, taxes sufficient to pay the debts and defray the expenses of government, but was dependent, in all such matters, upon the good will of the states and their promptness in meeting requisitions made upon them by Congress. But this is not all. The decision now made may provoke a contest in this country from which the American people would have been spared if the court had not overturned its former adjudications and had adhered to the principles of taxation under which our government, following the repeated adjudications of this Court, has always been administered. Thoughtful, conservative men have uniformly held that the government could not be safely administered except upon principles of right, justice and equality, without discrimination against any part of the people, because of their owning or not owning visible property, or because of their having or not having incomes from bonds and stocks. But by its present construction of the Constitution, the court, for the first time in all its history, declares that our government has been so framed that, in matters of taxation for its support and maintenance, those who have incomes derived from the renting of real estate, or from the leasing or using of tangible personal property, or who own invested personal property, bonds, stocks and investments, of whatever kind, have privileges that cannot be accorded to those having incomes derived from the labor of their hands, or the exercise of their skill, or the use of their brains. Let me illustrate this. In the large cities or financial centres of the country there are persons deriving enormous incomes from the renting of houses that have been erected, not to be occupied by the owner, but for the sole purpose of being rented. Near by are other persons, trusts, combinations, corporations, possessing vast quantities of personal property, including bonds and stocks of railroad, telegraph, mining, telephone, banking, coal, oil, gas, and sugar refining corporations, from which millions upon millions of income are regularly derived. In the same neighborhood are others who own neither real estate, nor invested personal property, nor bonds, nor stocks of any kind, and whose entire income arises from the skill and industry displayed by them in particular callings, trades or professions, or from the labor of their hands or the use of their brains. And it is now the law, as this day declared, that under the Constitution, however urgent may be the needs of the government, however sorely the administration in power may be pressed to meet the monied obligations of the nation, Congress cannot tax the personal property of the country nor the income arising either from real estate or from invested personal property, except by a tax apportioned among the states, on the basis of their population, while it may compel the merchant, the artisan, the workman, the artist, the author, the lawyer, the physician, even the minister of the Gospel, no one of whom happens to own real estate, invested personal property, stocks or bonds, to contribute directly from their respective earnings, gains, and profits, and under the rule of uniformity or equality, for the support of the government."

Associate Justice Jackson is equally emphatic in his views. His dissenting opinion contains this caustic criticism:

"The practical operation of the decision is not only to disregard the great principles of equality in taxation but the further principle that in the imposition of taxes for the benefit of the government the burdens thereof should be imposed upon those having most ability to bear them. This decision, in effect, works out a directly opposite result, in relieving the citizens having the greater ability, while the burdens of taxation are made to fall most heavily and oppressively upon those having the least ability. It lightens the burden upon the larger number, in some states subject to the tax, and places it most unequally and disproportionately on the smaller number in other states. Considered in all its bearings, this decision is, in my judgment, the most disastrous blow ever struck at the constitutional power of Congress. It strikes down an important portion of the most vital and essential power of the government in practically excluding any recourse to incomes from real and personal estate for the purpose of raising needed revenue to meet the government's wants and necessities under any circumstances. I am therefore compelled to enter my dissent to the judgment of the court."

Associate Justice White expresses his views on the majority opinion in this language:

"It is, I submit, greatly to be deplored that after more than one hundred years of our national existence, after the government has withstood the strain of foreign wars and the dread ordeal of civil strife and its people have become united and powerful, this court should consider itself compelled to go back to a long repudiated and rejected theory of the Constitution by which the Government is deprived of an inherent attribute of its being, a necessary power of taxation."

If associates of these majority judges can criticise the opinion in as harsh language as they use in these extracts, is it not the right of the sovereign people, who are the source of all power, and the actual creators of judges, Presidents and National Legislation, to express their views without being held up to the country as anarchists and traitors?

Of all the ridiculous arguments made by the Republicans in the attempt to belittle the action of the Chicago Convention, for its actions, the attack upon its declaration favoring an Income Tax is the most foolish, indeed so foolish and false, that it is amusing. It will be well for the Democrats to keep in mind the real facts when the sack is again opened and the vicious fusilade begins. Constant remembrance, and proper denunciation of frauds already committed, will possibly prevent the accomplishment of others doubtless in contemplation—"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Once More—Art and Morality

BY HARRY COWELL

"Truth," says Marcus Aurelius, "is my business, and," adds the philosopher, with more than imperial pride, "it hurts nobody." In good business, without question, was the greater son of the great Antoninus Pius, but the artist is in better—one that helps everybody. The business of the artist is Beauty. And well it is for both art and morality when the artist minds his own business; when he regards art neither as "the handmaiden of religion," nor as "an aid to public morality," but as an independent sovereign of a realm of joy, co-equal with any of the kingdoms of earth. He who deals in "about the best thing God has invented" (it is thus Browning somewhere speaks of Beauty), yes, who betters God's beauty, and sets a mark for Nature, has no reason to go through life apologetically, but every reason, rather, to foot it as proudly at least as that emperor of emperors, whose business was Truth.

Now to Art there is nothing immoral save the inartistic; not infrequently the "bad" books are the best. When a book or other art product is an abomination, almost invariably the fault is with the form. The thing is worse than immoral; it is inartistic. It is "bad," not because it lacks morals, but because it lacks beauty. To the eye of Art, no less than to the eye of Science, nothing is common or unclean. With Art, as well as with Nature, "the consummate flower is fostered out of dung," as witness "Les Fleurs de Mal" of Charles Baudelaire and the ballads of Francois Villon. Whatever is beautiful is moral, or better. Never yet was the world worse for any great work of art. Much pleasantry is made over the goodly company one may keep in hell. "There go," it is said with a devil-may-care laugh, "rare artists and even rarer lovers—those who will cause the desert of the damned to blossom into beauty like the Garden of Eden;" but, as for me, I should not lift the least eyebrow or blow the faintest whistle were I (having repented me of split infinitives, infelicitous phrases, over-alliteration, and the like deadly sins) to find in highest heaven the artist placed above the priest.

Goodness—that is the priest's business. Can he also without injuring the business of his brother, Marcus Aurelius, make the proud addition: "And never has it hurt any man?" Alas for Goodness, so long as it goes in sad gray and leaves Vice the smiling scarlet! Were virtue but to "prink up" a bit, it would soon be necessary to extend the limits of the Golden City.

The True, the Good, and the Beautiful are a triune deity, most worshipful when most one. Even the emperor might have given himself—on holidays—the latitude of the lie that regards Beauty as the sunny side of Truth; Ugliness, the shady. Nor is the hideousness of the monster, Vice, far to seek. Much of the goodness of the books I question, because it is not beautiful.

A stumbling block and an offense to morals is the use art makes of sex. Well, if religion itself but realized how much it owes to sex, it would, for very shame, keep silent. Art may have had its origin in sex. The one certainly has ever been closely connected with the other. The superflous springtime energy of the male bubbled over into beauty. Out of the superabundance of his joy came song and the printed page. Art is play work and in more than one sense a labor of love.

"Why," it is often asked, "does man, rather than woman, paint the most perfect pictures, write the greatest books, compose the divinest music?" The answer is easy; it is contained in another question: Why does the artist tend so strongly to become a libertine and the libertine tend so inevitably to lose his artistry? That which has peopled the palpitating earth with joy-giving creations of the created is the love of man for woman. And the fortunes of that love, which men follow into heaven or hell, are now, as of old, the legitimate subject-matter of Art.

It would be better, I think, for Art were it to profess frankly its unconcern about moral reform. Moral reform is all very well in its way, but its way is not Art's way. The artist knows well, and rejoices in the knowledge, that Goodness does not shun the abiding place of great beauty, but is ever to be found in its vicinity. The fine arts may be considered as devices for the purpose of creating desires in order to satisfy them—their end is delight. The individual artist works for his own end—beauty—and unintended social good results. And the more singly the artist works for his own end the greater the resultant good. Beauty may and does suggest Divinity to the mind of man, but it is not the business of the artist to create beauty to the end of suggesting Divinity. Not one maker of beautiful things out of a thousand strives for that end without missing it. Were Goodness the "greatest good," the end of ends, it would be none the less true that Art should seek beauty with singleness of purpose. To hear some very saintly persons holding forth against such a degraded doctrine as this which makes beauty the end of art, one is led to the blasphemous conclusion that ugliness must be a special attribute of the Deity. Beauty is, I take it, a word which might be breathed forth with but little inappropriateness by the smiling lips of archangels; and delight in Beauty is not, I hope, altogether unknown in heaven.

Let the artist mind his art and the moral effects of his work will look out for themselves, will be vital and far-reaching.

The Saunterer

The Shadows of Chinatown

Writers of fiction and play-makers have from time to time found San Francisco's Chinatown a capital locale for the scene of their imaginative creations, and they have delighted lovers of color and atmosphere with their pictures of the social modes of the people who infest that quaint and fascinating quarter. But the Chinatown sketches that have been contributed to literature are at best mere impressionist studies. No writer has ever thoroughly exploited the Chinese quarter or mined its foul, dark depths, its stifling labyrinths or its ill-smelling alleys for the tragedy, the mediæval romance and the repellant Oriental coloring with which that habitat of the heathen abounds. The records of our police courts reveal with sculptural distinctness and with photographic accuracy the traditional attributes of the barbarous pagan as shown by his fidelity to his racial customs which he has imported to this country. But even those records were incomplete until the recent exposure of the conspiracy hatched in Chinatown for the extermination of the members of the Chinese Educational Society. That exposure was made by Grant Carpenter, one of the keenest and ablest reporters that ever penned an item for a daily paper, and as a result of his skill in hunting down evidence Quon Quack Wah, one of the richest men in Chinatown, and the president of several of the tong societies, was convicted last Monday in Judge Lawlor's court of murder in the first degree.

Significant Silence of the Press

The achievement of Grant Carpenter is such a notable one that the silence of the daily press on the subject is an eloquent commentary on the puerile spirit that pervades the offices of the great moulders of public opinion. Grant Carpenter did what the Police Department dared not do. He exposed the most infamous murderous conspiracy ever concocted on this continent; he turned the calcium into the dark recesses of Chinatown and revealed the machinery of a government within a government, and operated in defiance of American law by cruel assassins. He brought to book nine of the most influential men in Chinatown, caused their indictment for murder, and secured the conviction of the first one put on trial, despite the liberal use of money, the threats of blackmailers and the perjury of witnesses. The story of the crime brings out the startling condition of affairs in Chinatown in colors of enamel. And it gives hint to so much that has not yet been revealed that the apathy of the dailies, in view of their periodical spasms of virtue superinduced by a desire to stop mere gambling in Chinatown, is remarkable.

The Eight Statesmen

Carpenter was sent into Chinatown some months ago by the Examiner to unearth the methods by which the gamblers secured police protection. It was about that time that a member of the Chinese Educational Society reported to the Mayor that the keepers of gambling houses were assessed for protection by a little band of men known as the "Eight Statesmen." Shortly after that one of the Educational Society was shot to death in Ross alley. Carpenter investigated the crime and learned that the murdered man was the victim of a conspiracy. The police were unable to fathom the mystery of the murder. Carpenter suspected that they were not anxious to do so. At any rate he fathomed it, and the result was the conviction of Quon Quack Wah last Monday. Upon the trial of the murderer, who was prosecuted by Attorney John J. Barrett, assisted by Carpenter, the latter marshaled the facts in a way that laid before the jury not only the whole startling story of the tragedy, but also the curious ramifications of commercial and criminal procedure in the Chinese quarter. It was shown that the "Eight Statesmen" had arbitrarily constituted themselves a committee to protect the keepers of the gambling houses. They protected them from the raids of Chinese thugs and also, it is said, from the police. Of course this is denied by the police, and Carpenter was unable to connect the "statesmen" with any representative of the department, but it was significant that when matters were running smoothly in Chinatown, when the gamblers were contributing to the protection fund handled by the "statesmen" the police did not seriously interfere with the games.

The Conspiracy

The trouble that culminated in the tragedy arose when the keepers of one of the gambling houses haggled one day over the amount of the assessment levied against his establishment. He at first refused to pay, and later on sought to have the amount reduced. Pending the settlement his place was frequently raided by the police. When the money was paid the transaction was witnessed by a member of the Educational Society, a friend of the gambler. He thought the amount too large and that his friend was being cinched, and in a fit of indignation he reported the matter to Mayor Schmitz. Thereupon the police became very active, and as a consequence there was great indignation in Chinatown. The "Eight Statesmen" were sore on the members of the Educational Society, and at their instance a meeting was called of the tongs that comprise the See Yup society. These tongs were at one time dominated by the respectable element among the Chinese, but many years ago the highbinders managed to get control of them, and they now constitute the government of Chinatown. At this meeting of the tongs the plaint of the "statesmen" was heard, and it was resolved to turn the See Yup hatchet-men loose for a bloody carnival. It was agreed to pay five hundred dollars for each victim, and it was further agreed that in the event of the arrest and conviction of any assassin the society should send fifteen hundred dollars in gold or eighteen hundred dollars in Mexican coin to his family in China.

Those Vigilant Policemen

Two of the tong presidents turned state's evidence when the indictments were filed, and a third was on the point of doing so, but after dictating a statement of the conspiracy he refused to sign. He explained that if he did so he would have his head shot off. He preferred to take a chance with our judicial system than to invite the vengeance of the inexorable tongs of Chinatown. The man who was convicted last Monday, and who will have to suffer the death penalty, was one of the most enthusiastic conspirators, and it was proved during the trial that he supplied the weapons to several of the hatchet-men just as they started off to earn the blood-money. They succeeded in killing only one man when the conspiracy was exposed, and then the hatchet-men ran to cover, and the Educational Society men, the proposed victims, barricaded themselves in an impregnable retreat where they are still awaiting developments. Of course they are entitled to police protection, but they haven't much confidence in the police, a whole squad of whom went on the witness stand for the defence of the murderous Wah. Several of the Educational men witnessed the murder in Ross alley and testified that they fled the scene, disappearing in the darkness. The police officers were called to testify that they were in the neighborhood, and that they saw nobody running away. Asked if the streets were illuminated, they replied that a person could read a newspaper, so bright were the street lights. The prosecution proved, by the testimony of an official of the gas company, that on that night the lamps had not been lighted. The police officers are still in the department, and they have not yet caught the man who fired the fatal shot. It is said that he is now in China.

The Legal Battle

The trial of murderer Wah lasted four weeks, and excited considerable interest in legal circles. The defence was handled by Peter F. Dunne, the railroad attorney, who is regarded as a very shrewd trial lawyer, being especially skilful in influencing juries by artful manœuvres. He had for an adversary John J. Barrett, who is a much younger man, but one of rare ability. He has been wonderfully successful at the bar, and he was at no time awed by the prestige of the senior counsel. Dunne undertook to laugh the case out of court, a trick that is quite often successful, but Barrett insisted on disciplining Dunne every little while, and they had a number of exciting tilts. At the close of a long and tedious trial attorney Dunne waived argument, in a manner that suggested that he did not think it worth while. This is quite a familiar bluff and it is sometimes effective, but in this instance it proved a tactical mistake, for the jurors took the case seriously, and concluded that Dunne was afraid to argue it. It was a great victory for Barrett. After the verdict was rendered it was rumored that a big sack had been raised in Chinatown for the bribing of the jury, but that no effort was made to use it because the attorney for the defence was confident his client would be acquitted. The supposition is that the Chinese who handled the sack pocketed it. Now that the rich and influential Wah is approaching the gallows, the Chinese are bound to bestir themselves for there is no telling how many of them will be involved. Under such circumstances it is usual for the hatchet-men to become active, and it will occasion no surprise in police circles if some of the witnesses are now assassinated.

Silence of the Dailies

Meanwhile it should be interesting to observe to what extent the activity of the police will go. Unfortunately Carpenter is no longer employed by the Examiner, having severed his connection with that paper a short time ago, and nothing is being done to stimulate the authorities in the performance of their duties. The sensational revelations concerning the doings of the "Eight Statesmen" received scarcely any attention from the Examiner's contemporaries because of the absurd notion in newspaperdom that it is unwise to exploit the story of a rival, even though the public interests might be promoted. Carpenter surely performed a great public service in exposing the doings of the tongs and the gamblers, and it is too bad that he was not encouraged to prosecute his labors further, for he had grave suspicions regarding the relationship between the police and the "statesmen." He is the same reporter, by the way, who brought charges of crookedness against Chief Wittman some years ago when the latter was a sergeant of police.

A Want Ad

Wanted: A good, stanch Republican to run for Mayor of this city. He must have some reputation to lose, a fat purse loosely tied, and a flexible glad-hand. He must be docile and guaranteed to stand without being tied. He must agree to take program at all hours of the day and night. He must have the confidence of the commercial element and not the ill-will of the laboring man. He must be friendly with the liquor interests, and also with the quasi-public corporations. No demagogues or reformers need apply.

Walsh Hunts Down His Detractor

During the recent primary election campaign the factions in the several districts fusiladed one another with vitriolic circulars. The most caustic of the political jeremiads was issued by the Democratic League faction in the Thirty-seventh district. It was a very savage attack on Registrar Walsh and his chief deputy, both of whom live in the district. It charges them with having resorted to very reprehensible methods in previous campaigns, and denounced them in bitter language. When Registrar Walsh read the circular he became very excited, and vowed that he would prosecute the author for criminal libel. He hurried to the establishment where the circular was printed and demanded to know by whom the work was ordered. He was told, and then he spent several days going from one person to another tracing the authorship of the peppery paper. Meanwhile the author, who was none other than Charles Wesley Reed, made no effort to escape the Registrar's wrath. He acknowledged the authorship to everybody who asked him about it. He heard about the wild-eyed indignation of Walsh, but he wouldn't take to the woods. Finally they met one day last week, and Walsh produced the circular and proceeded to relate how he had been hunting down the author. He said that the men who brought it to the printer had promised never to mix up in politics again, and also agreed to be good forever. Then he intimated that if he found the author he would probably be lenient with him if he begged for forgiveness.

Reformer Reed Grows Eloquent

Then the Registrar looked inquisitively at the attorney and paused for a reply.

"Well," said Reed, "I wrote that circular and as every word of it is true I have no intention of retracting or apologizing."

This bold statement staggered Walsh, but when he recovered he adopted a conciliatory tone.

"I never injured you, Mr. Reed," he said, "and I don't see why you should seek to injure me."

"Oh, yes, you did," said Reed. "You went around this town when I was running for Supervisor, telling people that I was an A. P. A., and that I attended the A. P. A. meeting at Metropolitan hall."

"Well, you did," retorted Walsh.

Thereupon Reed grew indignant and overwhelmed the Registrar with sizzling epithets. Walsh explained that he thought Reed attended the A. P. A. meetings because he had been seen about fifteen blocks distant from Metropolitan hall on several Sundays on which the meetings were held. It was upon this prima facie evidence that he had sought to injure Reed politically. After some further conversation Walsh suggested that they shake hands, but Reed spurned the offer, denounced him again and told him that he was a fit associate for Max Popper and Sammy Braunhart.

Aftermath of the Primary

It is rather significant that the only districts captured by those immaculate and puritanical exponents of political cant, Gavin McNab and James D. Phelan, are those in which the "push" and the riff-raff predominate. All those north of Market street, which include the swell residential districts, gave majorities to the Democratic League, which is the organization that has been so persistently maligned by the Bulletin at the instigation of Phelan and McNab. Those distinguished bosses captured the Barbary Coast, the water front and the districts south of Market where cheap lodging houses are numerous and votes are easily purchased. The records show that in every district from the Thirty-sixth to the Forty-third inclusive, the League delegates were elected. It is also significant that the Forty-first district, in which Franklin K. Lane resides, was lost by the Phelan-McNab combine, together with every other district in which Lane's office deputies were active against the League. Nevertheless Lane's popularity appears to be undisputed, according to the two leading Republican papers, the Bulletin and the Chronicle, both of which depend on McNab for inspiration in all matters pertaining to Democratic politics. The Chronicle is free from his influence editorially, but he manages adroitly to color its local news, and the consequence is that he has had the able assistance of that paper in strengthening Lane's fences. Even Mr.

Kalypto Preserves the TEETH and GUMS

De Young, who is a leading member of the Republican League, and who is anxious to elect a Republican Mayor, has not had sense enough to realize that his paper was being used to boost a Democrat into the office. We were told by the Chronicle that the victory of McNab at the primaries meant the routing of Rainey and other disreputable bosses. It didn't mean anything of the sort, but the inference from such a statement is that the Democratic convention is to be independent and free from boss influence. Never before was Mr. De Young so generous to the Democratic party. His associate Lamas of the Republican League should discipline him.

The Exit of Bill English

William D. English, whose death occurred in Oakland last week, was one of the old school of Democratic politicians, the representatives of which have been gradually losing their grip on the political machine in this State. It was the old school politician who knew how to conduct campaigns and arouse enthusiasm. Bill English was an expert in that sort of thing. He was one of the most widely beloved men in California and he had the respect even of his enemies. He was a big-hearted fellow, a bon vivant, a genial companion and a self-sacrificing friend. Is is the fortune of a very small percentage of the human family to be blessed with so many virtues and burdened with so few faults as were combined in the greatly lamented William D. English.

Why Schwab Resigned

According to the despatches Charles Schwab, who resigned the presidency of the United States Steel Corporation, expects to be elected to the office again in the near future. I doubt very much that Mr. Schwab will ever again be elected to that high office, for I have been reliably informed that his downfall was not due to the wrecking of his nervous system, but rather to his sensational dissipations and especially to the flamboyant escapade in which he was involved at Monte Carlo about a year ago. A New York financier informed me some time ago that Schwab was a high-flyer, and that his extravagances had aroused the distrust of many of the large stockholders of the billion dollar trust. No doubt he was threatened with nervous collapse, but when he was sent away in search of health he tried to find it at the roulette tables, and he played at Monte Carlo with practically the roof for a limit. His conduct aroused the indignation of J. P. Morgan and other associates and they called a halt. Investors can have no confidence in the management of a concern whose president spends money in a way calculated to make conservative people gasp with astonishment. Schwab's conduct was regarded as evidence of a trait of recklessness which his associates considered undesirable in a man in his position. Schwab went the pace that leads to paresis, and that is why the agitation was started that ended in his resignation.

A Sideboard Preferred

Some time ago there was considerable agitation among commuters over the threat of the Southern Pacific Company to abolish the bars on the Oakland boats. The thirsty commuters were much worried over the prospect of going across the bay on temperance boats, and a howl went up that could be heard on Goat Island on a stormy night. Though the company has not banished liquor from the boats it has abolished the bar on one of them—the Oakland. A sideboard has been substituted and is located in one corner of the restaurant. This innovation is not a commendable one, for the restaurant is frequently patronized by women, and their presence does not deter some men from conducting themselves at the sideboard just as they would in a bar-room.

A plain woman is expected to be virtuous; a pretty woman can be what she likes.

Claudia Lured From Us

Claudia Rodgers, whose many affairs of the heart have been the subject of much newspaper comment during the past year, believes that the East presents a wider field for the development of her varied talents. She has received and accepted an offer from a Chicago manager to appear in a prominent part in "The Babes in Toyland," a new extravaganza. Claudia's local stage career was interrupted several times by persistent suitors. Once she was said to have eloped with young Adrian Splivalo, and at that time her disappearance occasioned much anxiety. Splivalo was subsequently shipped to Honolulu. Miss Rodgers was reported engaged and married several times, and always to some young man whose family exchequer would tempt almost any maiden. It will not be long before Claudia will drift from Chicago to New York, unless meanwhile she captures a pork-packer. When she strikes Broadway the Johnnies will sit up and take notice.

Mayer the Raconteur

Marcus Mayer, the impresario, who is to manage Adelina Patti's next "farewell" tour, is among other things a noted raconteur. He had my eager ear for about an hour last Saturday, and he poured into it a flood of interesting recollections, some for publication and others that were in the nature of privileged communications. Mayer has been connected with the theatrical business so many years that few people recall that he was once a newspaper man in this city. He started in on the lowest rung of the journalistic ladder, having learned the printer's trade. He told me that he worked at the case in Francis Valentine & Co.'s establishment in the early days and that Henry George, the noted single-tax prophet, worked alongside of him. Charley De Young was a printer in the same shop in those days, and Frank Mayo, who afterwards became a famous actor, "kicked the press." Later on Mayer became a reporter on the old Alta, and he was at one time a sporting editor and a dramatic critic.

Founding of the "Call"

The impresario related some of the early history of the Morning Call, which paper he said was founded by four printers who were out on a strike. They were Charles Jobson, James J. Ayer who afterwards became proprietor of the Los Angeles Herald, George Barnes, the dramatic critic who died a few years ago, and David Higgins, who was recently Premier of British Columbia. According to Mayer they spent a long time trying to agree on a name for the paper, and one night they met in the Faustkeller, a beer saloon on Montgomery street, to talk the matter over. After wrangling quite awhile one of them noticed a play-bill calling attention to the fact that a piece was being played at Maguire's Opera House entitled "The Morning Call." He suggested that it would be a good name for the paper and it was adopted without further discussion.

That Marvelous Voice

On the subject of Madame Patti's next "farewell," Mr. Mayer is quite enthusiastic, and he desires to pose as a public benefactor for having decided to hold the two concerts next January in the Mechanics' Pavilion, where the famous diva may be heard at comparatively popular prices. Everybody he meets asks him whether her vocal organ is in first-class working order, and he is willing to make an affidavit that it retains its pristine quality and strength. "I heard her in London three months ago," he says, "and I was convinced that her superb voice still excels that of any woman on the operatic stage. Madame Patti was blessed with a naturally flexible voice, the equal of which we have never heard, and it was so easy for her to sing, so masterly was the cultivation, that she never had to exert unduly her vocal chords. That is why her voice today betrays no evidence of wear and tear."

Pendleton of the Marines

I learn with no surprise that Captain Joseph H. Pendleton, of the Marines, has been found physically disqualified for promotion to his majority by reason of defective eyesight. As a matter of fact, Pendleton's eyesight has been extremely defective since he left the naval academy, and the only remarkable thing about his present predicament is that he managed to get by the surgeons for promotion to the grades of first lieutenant and captain. Captain Pendleton married one of the bright Fay girls, daughters of Professor "Billy" Fay of the Naval Academy. Two of the other sisters also married into the Navy. The near-sighted captain has been noted in the service for his strong predilection for "springing rank" on the slightest provocation. I recall one occasion when he resorted to the practice to save himself when worsted in a chance steerage-mess argument, when he was a second lieutenant, on the old Pensacola, out in the Mediterranean. One of the midshipmen, a Georgian, had been discussing some of the motives actuating the South during the Civil war, and his statements drove Pendleton into a corner. Driven to bay, Pendleton "sprung rank," as the senior officer, by threatening to report the midshipman for using seditious language. This was in the year of our Lord 1886.

Colonel "Bob" Meade

Colonel "Bob" Meade, of the Marines, seems to have a faculty for getting himself into trouble. It was only a couple of years ago that he was court-martialed for drunkenness on duty, but the court brought in a verdict of acquittal, and I was glad of it, for Meade has always been a gallant officer, and has had hard experiences in his forty years of service, including long imprisonment in Libby Prison during the Civil war, and the rigors of the Chinese campaign. He again dropped into hot water the other day as a result of an injudicious communication to the Navy Department. The delicate touch of the same enemies that instigated the court-martial is to be observed in this latest episode. "Bob" Meade comes naturally by his irascibility. His father, old Captain Richard Meade, was one of the "bucko" officers of the old school, whose eccentricities in his later years were abnormal even for officers of his type. "Bob's" brother, the late Rear-Admiral "Dick" Meade, was a chip of the old block, often embroiled both with his fellow officers and with the department. Shortly before his death he was involved with the higher powers in an imbroglio of even greater seriousness than the latest one of his younger brother.

"Buck" Miller to Retire

Since his marriage five years ago with the daughter of Captain Bowman H. McCalla, Lieutenant William G. Miller, of the Navy, has found the restrictions of the service more and more irksome. He has recently applied for retirement from active service, under the provisions of the law permitting the Secretary of the Navy to stimulate the flow of promotions by a few more or less arbitrary retirements when the number of vacancies in a grade falls below a certain figure. Lieutenant Miller was formerly one of the leading athletes of his class when at the Naval Academy, being a member of the academy football and baseball teams. He bases his application for retirement upon the claim that service in the tropics injures his health unduly. I am told that Miller has grown much in hauteur of late years, and that he is inclined to resent the sobriquet of "Buck," which was bestowed upon him in earlier days.

When Hunter Was a Plebe

Of the regular troops in last Tuesday's parade, it struck me that the best impression was made by the battalion of Coast Artillery under the command of Captain Charles H. Hunter, known in his cadet days as "Tum" Hunter, a soldier bred and a soldier born, his father, the fine old General, having been one of our best officers of the old school. "Tum" Hunter got his nickname as a result of his proficiency in the performance of one of plebehood's duties. It is a favorite pastime of the upper classmen, at both West Point and Annapolis, when "deviling" or "running" the plebes, to cause them to memorize and recite some fantastic rhyme or other nonsense when called upon to do so, combining the recitation with more or less oratoric gesture and fervor, for the greater entertainment of their persecutors. "Alice in Wonderland" produced some good material for this purpose in the class of '80, which was Hunter's. The Jabberwock and other mythical creatures fell to the lot of some. Hunter, when asked who he was, was required to answer that he was the "Tum-Tum bird," and to discourse on the peculiar qualities of that songster. He made such an entirely satisfactory "Tum-Tum bird" that the title of "Tum" was taken up even by his classmates, and stuck to him thereafter.

A G. A. R. Story

Old General Butler of Connecticut has been having a great time renewing acquaintance with erstwhile residents of the nutmeg State who live in California. In the Palace hotel corridor the other day General Butler told a story about the late "Joe" Bromley, of the Thirteenth Connecticut, a brother of "Uncle" George Bromley, who was among those gathered about the veteran raconteur. "In the winter of '62-'63," said General Butler, "Joseph Bromley was quartermaster of my crack regiment—the Thirteenth. He beguiled the tedium of routine work by his ready wit, and his skill at catering won him the regard of men and officers. I remember how Joe managed to get wood, when that aid to warmth was hard to obtain. He ordered his men to the depot of the Carrollton railroad, and started them to loading their teams. The superintendent of the road came along and remarked:

" 'What are you going to do with that wood?'

" 'Cook rations. Go on with your loading, Corporal,' said Joe.

" 'Who are you?' questioned the superintendent, and Bromley answered with the information desired, adding: 'Allow me, sir, to inquire whom I have the distinguished honor to address.' The superintendent replied, and remarked with decision that the wood was the railroad's, and he positively forbade any quartermaster of any army whatsoever to remove it.

" 'Put your protest in writing, in red ink, tie it with a piece of red tape,' answered Bromley, 'I'll approve it and forward it. You see, we've got to have wood to cook with; can't eat beans and pork raw. I'd prefer 'em raw, but the men are so unreasonable they want 'em cooked.'

"The superintendent continued his protests, indeed he was acting by my orders," said the General, "but Joe finally won out. By the way, he is the same man who issued these orders to a corporal: 'We're going on an expedition. I want my staff to be on the lookout for turkeys, geese, pigs and sheep. Don't be the aggressor in any contest. Stand strictly on the defensive; but, if you're attacked by any of these animals, show fight, and don't forget to bring off the enemy's dead.' "

An Ex-Rebel's Joke

A G. A. R. veteran whose breast was covered with badges was standing in front of a cigar store at Stockton and Market streets last Tuesday, watching the parade, when he was approached by a stranger who gave him a military salute.

"Got a lot of decorations, haven't you?" said the stranger.

"Yes, quite a number," proudly replied the veteran.

"I helped put them there badges on you," said the stranger.

The veteran looked surprised. "I don't understand you," he said.

"Well, you see," continued the stranger, "I was all through the fightin' on the other side. I don't know how many of you we killed, but judging by your pension list, we wounded quite a number."

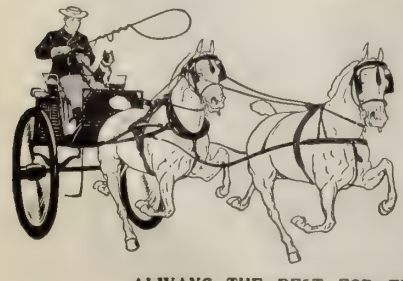
Then the two grizzled warriors shook hands and went in and had a drink.

A Famous Regiment

One of features of the big parade on Wednesday was the remnant of the famous Mozart regiment, the Fortieth New York volunteers. This regiment was mustered into the service on June 14, 1861, and was at the front four years and one month. During most of that period the regiment saw continuous service, and lost twelve hundred and forty-five men. Its casualties were greater than those of any other New York regiment and were exceeded by only seven others in the entire army. There were twenty men in line last Wednesday, representing eight States. They were under the command of Major R. E. Whitefield of this city who is president of the California battalion of the Mozart Association.

Lummis and the Indians



Like many another strenuous theorist, Charles F. Lummis of corduroy and sombrero fame is better at writing about things and advocating reforms on paper than in giving any material assistance to the practical accomplishment of things. Lummis has been talking about the Warner Ranch Indians with the voice of a Delphic oracle and those who have been reading his articles on the subject have been led to believe that what Lummis did not know about Indians and their welfare was hardly worth putting into a two-line paragraph. But there are persistent rumors throughout Southern California to the effect that the Warner Ranch Indians know more about their tribal traits and longings than even Lummis does, and that they strenuously object to being taught how to be Indians by the wild and woolly editor of Out West. Be this as it may, Lummis has either resigned or been removed from the Indian Commission appointed to take charge of the Warner Ranch eviction. And an experienced Indian agent has come to fill the vacancy. It is a general theory in the lemon belt that Lummis was a disturbing factor, irritating both to his fellow commissioners and to the benighted savages under his temporary charge. Many of the Indians declared that Lummis persisted in misunderstanding them. At last things reached such a pass that to remove the Indians peaceably something would have to be changed in the commission. The change was effected through the withdrawal of Lummis. Since that event the affairs of the Warner Indians have progressed with a peaceableness which would indicate that Lummis was a very good man not to have on the commission. The neatness and simplicity with which Lummis's successor has straightened up the whole affair shows more plainly than words that the Warner Ranch tangle called for an Indian agent and not for an Indian editor.

Why the Red Man is Disgruntled

The Warner Indians and their trials are a flamboyant example of the false and sloppy sentiment which some of our literary poseurs are fond of lavishing on the noble red man. Although the new reservation which has been given to the tribe is incomparably more fertile, beautiful and valuable than the old one which the tribe held and which is now owned by J. Downey Harvey, the Indians are far from satisfied and are raising a pathetic wail to the government. Their grievance is based on the fact that they have been cheated of their idleness. On the old Agua Caliente grant they were enabled to bleed tourists for baths in the springs and to sell Indian curios at exorbitant rates. But on the superior lands of the new tract they are confronted with the horrible reality of work. Not long ago the young men of the tribe struck and refused to build new houses because they were not issued by the government the same amount of rations which had been given to the older men who had families to support.

Might Have Been Sir George

"I saw that man playing Hamlet in India many years ago," said an Englishman who was witnessing the performance at the Columbia Tuesday night. He referred to George Titheradge, who plays the part of the minister. "And he was a good Hamlet, too, and he was a great favorite in India," continued the Englishman, "and by the way, he had the right to claim knighthood, and if he had done so he would have been the first actor to win that distinction." He related that at that time Lord Lytton (Owen Meredith) was then Viceroy of India, and that he was a great admirer of Titheradge. When the proclamation arrived proclaiming Queen Victoria Empress of India, the Viceroy selected the actor to act as the Herald for the purpose of reading the document. It was by reason of his performance of this high office that he was entitled to claim knighthood, which he never did.

Shaw's Quick Wit

Now that Henry Miller has introduced us to George Bernard Shaw through the medium of "The Devil's Disciple" there has been a revival of interest in society circles in the personality and works of the cynical Britisher. Shaw is as much of an egotist as was the late William Whistler, and he is almost as skilled in the gentle art of making enemies. He has a keen wit, too, and it is as ready on occasions as the sword of D'Artagnan. At the premier of his comedy, "Arms and the Man," in London, there were calls for the author, and Mr. Shaw responded. One dissentient in the gallery evidently regarded the presence of the author on the stage as an intrusion, and he expressed his disapproval by "booing" lustily. The playwright calmly turned his eyes toward the disturber and said:

"Yes, sir, I quite agree with you, but what can we two do against a whole houseful?"

Rushed By Society

Margaret Anglin is again leading a strenuous life in this city. Like Amelia Bingham she condescends to be lionized by the social push, and some of our fashionable matrons dearly love to stroke the lion's mane, especially if it reflects the glamour of the stage. On her last visit Miss Anglin was entertained by the Jack Casserlys, who are very ardent admirers of the actress. They led the applause at the Columbia Tuesday night. The house that night, by the way was much more fashionable than on the first night. The most distinguished of our social leaders, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, accompanied by the Walter Martins, occupied a stage box. Mrs. Martin wore the gayest of gay white hats, a very dainty creation that sat jauntily on her classic head. That most ravishing of all our society girls, Miss Russell, the fiancee of Clem Tobin, occupied a loge with him, and divided interest with the mummers.

Dillingham's Famous Fake

Charles B. Dillingham, manager of the Miller-Anglin company, was a Chicago newspaper man before he went into theatricals. It was when he was doing the hotel corridor stunt for his paper that he perpetrated a fake that made him famous, or at least known on both continents. News was slack one day, no prominent visitors to interview at any of the hotels, so Dillingham sizzled his brains in vain for copy. As he hung over the register of the Hotel Richelieu, the hostelry kept by the late "Cardinal" Bemis, a bright idea struck him. He took up a pen and inscribed upon the register the name of "Signor Pasquale Bellini—Roma, Italia." Then he sat himself down and dashed off, with Lafcadio Hearn-like rapidity, page after page of a brilliant interview with Signor Bellini. He made his man say that the Vatican was considering a removal of the Holy See from Rome to Berne, in Switzerland, on account of certain political embarrassments. The Signor was made to state that Leo XIII approved of the proposed move, and many other incredible statements were laid to Bellini's tongue. The "great stuff" was featured by the paper and it was considered a big scoop. It made two continents talk, and cablegrams denying everything, even the existence of Bellini, came flashing over from Europe. The managing editor went for Dillingham, who referred him to the hotel register for his authority, and "Cardinal" Bemis stood by the reporter. It was a long time before the fact that it was a fake leaked out.

The Morality Play

The Morality Play's the thing just now. Henry Miller explained "Everyman" to a Channing Auxiliary audience last Thursday, a la Walter Damrosch, and he excited great interest in it. As the Lyric hall holds but nine hundred people and as the Channing ladies have taken the first chance at the seats, not many will be left for the general public, but there will be some on sale next Monday. The entire house is reserved and there are very few dollar seats. The audience will, of course, be fashionable. The Channing Auxiliary will not make much out of it, as they have to pay eleven hundred dollars for the performance, but they will make a little—perhaps four hundred dollars.

A Poet's Finger Caused Anxiety

One of the amusing stories included in the aftermath of the Bohemian jinks is about the hasty summoning of Dr. "Jack" Shiels from a private camp five miles distant from the grove, to save Al Grim's index finger. Grim is the poet laureate of bohemia and it was of him Wilton Lackaye said, "His enemies call him the Alfred Austin of America." Well, he cut his finger severely with a hatchet while erecting a tent in the grove, and a young doctor who happened to be on the scene dressed the wound. One of the club bell-boys heard the doctor remark, "That will have to come off." He meant the bandage, but the boy thought he referred to the finger. Now this particular boy doesn't know anything about poetry but he takes Grim's verse seriously, and is a great admirer of the versesmith. Moreover he had no confidence in the young doctor, concluded that he was a butcher and resolved to save the finger. So without informing anybody of his intention, he hitched a horse to a buggy and rode off in hot haste for Dr. Shiels. "Come quick, doctor, and save Al Grim's finger," he exclaimed as soon as he saw Shiels. The latter jumped into the buggy and accompanied the boy back to the grove where Grim was found blissfully unconscious of the anxiety that he caused.

Ralph Miller, the Owls' manager, made some of the biggest catches of salmon at Capitola this week. J. J. Deane, F. A. Farrar and C. E. Ray of the Chronicle were also among the successful trollers.

"You appear to to take Grouch seriously."
"I regard him as an atrabilious genius."
"I thought you misjudged him. He's merely a spiteful nonentity."

The Abandonment of a Career

Miss Lillie Lawlor having announced her intention to leave Paris and spend the winter in New York, Madame La Bavarde remarks, "This looks as if Miss Lawlor had abandoned all idea of a professional career for Paris is the place for study along that line." No doubt she has. She probably abandoned it a long time ago. When Miss Lawlor gave her concert in this city some months ago I stated that she lacked one essential to success on the concert stage—a voice. Of study she has had quite enough, for her method is far superior to that of many women on the professional stage. What voice she has is beautifully cultivated, and if she could impart to others the instruction she has received she would be a most successful teacher, but she should never take to the professional stage. Miss Lawlor being a sensible woman has, I hope, not been influenced by the "hot air" of her society friends, very few of whom can differentiate singing from howling. She is not the only woman who has wasted her time abroad in the cultivation of a parlor voice in the hope of creating a sensation on the operatic stage. Scarcely a week passes that some daily does not announce the departure of some sweet singer for foreign parts in quest of vocal cultivation with a view to adopting a professional career. In nearly every instance the sweet singer has been told by her friends that she has a marvelous voice, and she believes them. If one in every five hundred proved a success operatic stars would be a drug on the market.

Sanger and Mrs. Sanger are "In"

A correspondent writes me that the swellest thing at Long Branch this summer is Sanger Pullman. Sanger has started out as an organizer of functions and introduced the paper chase as she is done in San Rafael with much success. The new style of fox hunt was such a hit that Sanger was overwhelmed with compliments. He rides much better than formerly, my correspondent writes, and has actually managed to be "in at the death" several times. Mrs. Sanger has grown so stout that her old acquaintances in San Francisco would scarcely know her. And, by the way, Mrs. Pullman senior no longer looks the other way when her son's wife drives by. She has finally decided that recognition was due to Mrs. Sanger Pullman. Mere Pullman has a cottage at Elberon near Long Branch and her equipages and horseflesh are the envy of less well-to-do mortals.

The Deserted Village

Burlingame has lately been dubbed "The Deserted Village." The homes of many of the smart set have been closed for months, and others are to be abandoned in the near future. The Frank Carolans have gone East and will sail for Europe on the twenty-sixth. They expect to be away six months. Prince and Princess Poniatowski are going abroad again next month and will remain away an indefinite length of time. The Prince is in poor health, and looks as though he is in need of a long rest. The Hobarts are still in Paris where a son was born on the ninth. It is the third olive-branch that has blessed the Hobart union. The young millionaire cabled the news to a few of his friends in this city. Mrs. Hobart may never again return to Burlingame. The sale of their home was a sad blow to her, and before she went away she confided to a friend that she would like to live abroad the remainder of her life.

Hatcher's First Plunge

The gossips of San Jose have had something to talk of since they received news of the marriage of Charles Hatcher, formerly a resident of that city, with Miss Alice Schreiner, a New York heiress. Hatcher was married in San Jose to Miss Carrie Newman some time ago, but they never liyed together. The husband brought suit for divorce, alleging that he had been forced into the ceremony. Mrs. Hatcher filed a cross-complaint charging desertion and she was granted the decree. A few months ago Hatcher went to Boston, where he has since been engaged in business as a stock and bond broker, and he has been very successful.

The Man With the Bracelet

Hubert Henry Davies, whose play "Mrs. Gorringe's Necklace" is thrilling London theatregoers, was well known in San Francisco a year or two ago. He was employed as a clerk by Balfour, Guthrie & Company and wrote some indifferent verse for local papers. He started the craze for jade here and wore heavy rings, cuff buttons and shirt studs all made of the green stone. Now and then he wore a jade bracelet that excited the envy of his feminine friends. He was a frequent visitor at the home of Mrs. Carmichael-Carr and there he met Pilar-Morin of L'Enfant Prodique fame. She admired the bracelet so much that she made a wager with her friends that she would own it before the week was over. Every one laughed at her for they knew that the ornament was his choicest treasure. However, at the end of the week the dainty pantomimist was wearing the green hoop. She explained that she had given the young dilettante a rousing lecture on the effeminacy of wearing a bracelet, and that when she had finished he presented her with it. After that they became good friends and Davies wrote a clever pantomime for her .

To Essay Rachel's Great Role

Grace Llewellyn Jones has been chosen for the title role in Racine's "Phedre" which is to be produced at the new amphitheatre in Berkeley some time in the early winter. Since her return from Venice two years ago Miss Jones has made quite an enviable reputation as an elocutionist. I hear that some dissatisfaction was expressed among the students over her selection for the role, it having been the original plan to allow none but college students to take part in the plays to be produced in the amphitheatre. However Miss Jones will enter the college in a post graduate course. Society people on both sides of the bay are curious to see her attempt Rachel's great part, one that inspired even Bernhardt with nervous hesitation. On the professional stage it is believed that proficiency in the tricks of the elocutionist is fatal to the aspirant for histrionic honors, but the friends of Miss Jones are confident that she will overcome the handicap.

"I never knew how much dust there was in the house," observed Mrs. Youngmatron, "until I got my new eye-glasses."

"I wish, then, you'd kept the old ones," snapped the housemaid.

Chicago's Idol to Visit California

Mrs. Lillian Bell Bogue is on her way to the coast and several of the women's clubs are preparing to entertain her. Several clubmen, I understand, are also desirous of lionizing the erstwhile "old maid," who wrote so entertainingly about love before she married. Lillian Bell is the idol of Chicago's literati. They worshiped her before she married, because of the lectures she gave deriding the married state, and since she went back on her theories they think none the worse of her. She is not a beautiful woman, but is said to be very engaging in appearance and she has a possession the average woman lacks—humor. Her latest book, "The Dowager and the American girl," is good, but the brunt of her reputation rests on "The Love Affairs of an Old Maid." One of her best productions from a philosophical viewpoint is "The Under Side of Things." In this among other things she observes:

A man with a conscience will sacrifice his head and his bodily comfort to his ideal of duty, but he clings tenaciously to his heart's desire, and yields that last of all. A woman with a conscience often makes a burnt-offering of her heart from pure altruism. Men call such a woman a saint—or cold.

It really would be a delightful as well as a most instructive thing if a man occasionally could exchange places with the woman he loves and view his actions through her eyes. Perhaps he might better understand her causeless jealousies and her unreasonable way of holding him to account for quite harmless diversions. He might see how the moments he spends with other girls seem to lengthen out into the basis of a good quarrel—so different are men's eyes from women's. It would benefit them in the same degree that a year's travel benefits a provincial youth. He learns a new point of view.

Lillian Bell is no Ella Wheeler Wilcox. She never writes poems of passion, but she has written some things about men and women that are worth reading and that is why club men as well as club women are anxious to entertain her.

Golf Players Robbed

There was consternation among the members of the San Rafael Golf Club last Sunday when the discovery was made that several members had been robbed. Articles of jewelry and money had been stolen from the lockers while the owners were out on the links. The members being fearful of causing a scandal kept the matter very quiet, but there is considerable uneasiness in the club. The supposition is that one of the caddies was the perpetrator of the larceny, but of course this is merely a suspicion.

Josselyn's Next Effort

There are many cynical chaps in the Bohemian Club who do not take Charles Josselyn's literary pretensions seriously, though his book, "The True Napoleon," which was a compilation of all the good things that had been said about the Corsican, received much favorable criticism. The cynics and a few of the "knockers" have heard that he is now writing of books themselves, and that he will entitle his effort "On My Bookshelves," or "My Favorite Author" or something of the sort, and they are telling a story that he recently handed a list of books to a friend, and asked him what he thought of them. Under the head of Scientists he included Darwin, Huxley and James Anthony Froude. The circulation of this story has given rise to the supposition that "My Favorite Books" or "On My Bookshelves" will add to the gayety of nations.

"Why did you come home so soon if you were enjoying yourself so much at Monterey?"

"Well, I had worn every gown that I owned, and so it wasn't worth while prolonging my stay."

Greenwood vs. Peters

Differences have arisen between Charles Rollo Peters and Fred Greenwood that may lead to litigation. During the last exhibition of his paintings at the Bohemian Club Peters announced that he contemplated a trip to Europe for six months. Greenwood heard the news and he thought of the Peters cottage in Monterey which would be vacant during the summer months. He thought it would be a nice place in which to entertain his friends. So he forthwith negotiated with Peters and secured a lease of the premises. Then he proceeded to plan for the entertainment of his friends, and he arranged for several house parties. He went so far as to invite Eastern friends to come out and enjoy his hospitality. Meanwhile Peters changed his mind, as people with an artistic temperament frequently do. He concluded that Monterey was a pretty good place, and that he would spend his summer there. So he took possession of his cottage, and when Greenwood arrived on the scene he was greatly astonished to find Peters enjoying all the comforts of home. He demanded possession but Peters told him he had changed his mind. That is why Greenwood is now residing at Del Monte instead of at the Peters cottage. He is very indignant and his friends say that he may institute suit against the artist.

Mrs. Astor's Ball

The Associated Press detected a wonderfully sensational bit of news in Mrs. Astor's ball at Newport last week. Mrs. Astor had invited eight hundred people and the Associated Press concluded that there had been a letting down of social bars, because the elite of New York were supposed to number not more than four hundred. The 400 of the late Ward McAllister has been a generic designation for New York society for over twelve years, but no one in touch with Eastern society affairs imagined that the socially acceptable people of the metropolis could possibly be limited to that number even in the lifetime of the renowned arbiter elegantiarum. Mrs. Astor does not often give a ball at Newport but when she does she invites nearly everybody of any prominence. She believes in the general mingling of respectable society, at a summer resort. Mrs. Astor is not exclusive merely for the purpose of asserting aristocratic pretensions. That sort of exclusiveness is to be found at Blingum and San Rafael, where the provincial elite are not quite sure of their social status. Mrs. Astor is so sure of hers that she doesn't bother much about who's who or who isn't. She wouldn't lose prestige even though she was caught talking to her hair-dresser on a street corner.

"Why do you think her ball dress didn't cost much? I think it's a Worth gown."

"Well, I think it's cheap because it doesn't come high, and besides there isn't much of it."

What Mrs. Coit Should Do

Madame Bavarde says that Mrs. Lillie Coit quite seriously contemplates a return to San Francisco. Mrs. Coit's friends here scarcely give credence to the news, for when she left here after her mother's death it was with the resolution that the rest of her life would be passed in Paris. I wish Mrs. Coit would spend some of her declining years in writing a book about San Francisco society. Her knowledge of our aristocracy would supply the motifs for several brilliant society novels. California's social annals teem with material for the novelist which nobody has yet handled with the skill necessary to invest it with the proper significance.

Mrs. Coit's mother, the widow of Dr. Hitchcock, came to San Francisco in early days, and what she did not know about the inner side of society life was not worth knowing. I have heard that when Mrs. Hitchcock and Mrs. Hager—both long since passed away—got together over a cup of tea in their apartments at the Palace, the reminiscences of society life were well worth listening to.

A Woman of Character

When Gertrude Atherton gave the world "Senator North" everybody immediately picked Lillie Coit as the heroine, but the author would never say just whom she had in mind when drawing that unconventional character. Lillie Hitchcock was a lively girl in her early teens and old members of the Fire Brigade love to tell how she "ran with the old machine." Her marriage with Howard Coit was not a perfectly harmonious union. The club man was fascinating, and so was his wife, but they were not well mated, and so they separated. Mrs. Coit was very devoted to her mother, and they traveled about a good deal when not settled at the Palace.

Dr. Adrian Hoffmyer was the guest of honor at an elaborate dinner given by the Bohemian Club on Tuesday evening. Dr. Hoffmyer has made many warm friends since he came to California, and he has been extensively entertained here and in Oakland.

The Snob and Her Lair

The snobbery that marks the caste of the nouveau riche is as rampant in Los Angeles as it is in any other part of the State. A few years ago a Los Angeles widow, well mannered and bred, but who worked for a living in an humble position, decided to give her daughter the benefit of good educational advantages, and for that purpose to send her to the Marlborough School, a fashionable institution for the enlightenment of young ladies of good family. The girl was entered and thereupon fat and pompous matrons who were mothers of girls attending the school piously protested against the widow's daughter, who was most charming and refined, mingling with their dear offspring. In anguish of soul they drew up a round-robin and presented it to the head of the school. The mother of the girl promptly and indignantly withdrew her daughter's name from the roll. The sequel of this little social comedy recently occurred. Meanwhile the widow has become the wife of a millionaire and the other day she gave a house party. Among the delighted guests were many of the young women whose mothers had so hastily circulated the petition in the Marlborough incident.

So Thoughtful for Papa

They are telling a good story on little Anne Magee, the six-year old daughter of the late Thomas Magee. The other day when the child heard of the death of the Pope she said to her mother:

"I'm so glad the Pope's dead, aren't you?"

The mother was shocked and said, "Why, my dear, the Pope was a very good man, and I'm very sorry he is dead and very much shocked to hear you say that you are glad. Why should you say such a thing?"

"Why," said the child, wondering at her mother's tone, "I thought you'd be glad because now Papa has somebody to talk to."

Late arrivals at Byron Springs were Mrs. W. A. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. James Armstrong, Geo. W. Reed, Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Burns, H. Kohler, Dr. Raymond Reuss, Mr. and Mrs. S. M. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. John Scott Wilson and Miss Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney V. Smith and Miss Smith.

WHERE TO BUY CALIFORNIA SOUVENIRS.

Tourists some time ago discovered that the best place to buy pretty and original souvenirs of their visit to San Francisco is Schumacher & Co.'s, the jewelers at 8 New Montgomery street. The souvenirs are principally made of precious stones found on the coast, gold quartz jewelry, etc., and are unique in design and beautiful in conception.

Charlotte Tittel, who takes Julia Marlowe's place in the tour of "The Cavalier," is a San Francisco girl. She has been leading lady for Sothern, and has had many other fine positions.

Julia Marlowe will appear in a new comedy by H. V. Esmond in September. It is called "Fools of Nature," and Miss Marlowe's role is that of a young married woman with a boy of six.

The Soul of a Maiden

By Gabrielle Ashland

THEN.

Satan was bored, bored to death, which goes to prove that the modern tendencies are not reserved for one stratum of society. The old joy of hunting souls was a thing of the past. Every one was only too eager to start Hell-ward nowadays; in fact he had had to double the guard at the door. More from force of habit than the hope of seeing sport ahead he climbed up into his observation tower. It was an amusing place, the world, he thought, but horribly monotonous. Vice dressed in the garments of virtue, and virtue covering vice, played the same antics whether the background was gilded or of commonest clay. But suddenly his eye roving wearily over the familiar scene was arrested by a face—the face of a maiden; her clothes were poor and her condition lowly, but so innocent was the expression of her great eyes and so pure the light that seemed to emanate from her that Satan was abashed, but only for a second. Then he laughed the laugh of his Gounod representation and called for his two chief aides. He pointed to the maiden: "Do you see that? Well, go, both of you, and try to procure her for me. The one that succeeds shall be my chief here under me." Then he turned to look at her again, though it hurt his eyes, for he never expected them to be again so affected.

The aides, when they were alone, tossed for first innings, for each preferred an open field. The younger one won the toss and set off. He found the maid fair to look upon and being young and impetuous offered her gold for her soul, but she spurned him and with hard words drove him from her.

"What luck?" asked the elder aide maliciously, as he beheld the crestfallen air of his confrere.

"None! She refused gold. She will take nothing!"

The elder laughed. "You might have tried family diamonds," he suggested, mildly, as in a panama of most approved make he started off.

Being wiser than the other he was slower in the planning of his campaign. Seeing that she was beautiful, young and very innocent, he offered her bouquets of flowers, boxes of candies and many sweet words,—Love. Returning to Hell a little later he laid at his master's feet the Heart and Soul of the Maiden.

NOW.

Again Satan was bored, again he climbed the stairs of his observation tower. He gazed east, he gazed north, he gazed south. Nothing was changed—just the same old story. With a sigh of unutterable weariness he turned west. A speck on the horizon caught his eye. He adjusted the lens of his telescope. With its aid he saw—San Francisco; then a shop in San Francisco in which women spent the hard-earned dollars of their—husbands.

Amongst the crowd of beautifully gowned shoppers one face stood out supreme, the face of a maiden, beautiful but cold as ice. Again Satan was abashed, not as on a previous occasion, by the purity of the face upon which he gazed, but by the insolence which is bred of much gold and is unsurpassed in this world or the next. Stung to resentment by the unaccustomed indifference to his slightest glance he summoned as before his two chief aides. "Go at once," he snarled, "bring me that woman by hook or crook. You"—turning to the elder aide, "as my second in command, shall go first." But the aide declined the favor. He had succeeded once, he urged. Let his young friend have a chance of redeeming what he had lost by his previous failure. So with a self-satisfied smirk and a rose in his buttonhole the younger aide set off. He found that she had gold, position, diamonds and therefore friends, so profiting by his elder's example he offered her love. The peal of scornful laughter that greeted his offer brought a blush to even his shameless cheek, as amidst epigrammatic ridicule he took his departure.

The elder aide said nothing, but grinned a derisive grin as his brother in service slunk in and with carefully waxed moustache and eye-glass he started, whistling gaily, for the Golden Gate. He also viewed the gold, position and diamonds, and with an insolence equal to her own offered her—to take or leave as she thought fit—a coronet.

A week later, on bended knee, he offered to his master a crested box in which reposed the soul of a maiden.

CIGARS IN COURT.

The manufacturers of the famous Sanchez & Haya cigars have brought suit against H. Rinaldo for putting on the market a brand called "L. Sanchez." They assert that Rinaldo has proffered his brand to customers without comment or else extolling its virtues to those who ask for the Sanchez & Haya brand. The latter firm allege that many thousands of the spurious article have been sold, great injury to the genuine being done thereby. Their suit against Rinaldo has been filed in the U. S. Circuit Court.

Recompense

Before me dead you lie; your still, white face,
Impassive 'neath my glance,
Lies strangely patient in its resting place,
Nor marks the night's advance.

Alone, we two; no ling'ring pulse-throbs start
Or quiver at my touch.
I could not hold such hate within my heart
Had I not loved so much.

I'd gladly die could I but break your rest
And bring you back to men,
That I might plunge this dagger in your breast
And watch you die again.

Automobile Topics

Although the automobile tournament at Del Monte is over, interest in the pastime is ever on the increase and local automobile enthusiasts can look forward to a meet here some time in October or November. The officers of the Automobile Club of California held a meeting last Thursday evening and plans were discussed for the holding of a big race meet here in the winter in which all the big motors of the coast will participate. The local devotees intend to have some of the Eastern racing machines out here for the coming tournament, which promises even to surpass the initial one. Frank A. Garbutt, the great Los Angeles auto racer, has returned south with his share of the prizes at the Del Monte meet. Mr. Garbutt's intentions are to bring up the question of a race meet in the City of the Angels shortly. The idea is to get the big racing autos from the Atlantic coast to compete both here and in Los Angeles.

To operate a big Toledo touring car is quite a feat for a youth of only thirteen, but it has been accomplished by Lloyd Griffith, the son of S. N. Griffith, a capitalist of Fresno. Mr. Griffith is in this city at present to escape the heat at Fresno and he is accompanied by his skilful son, probably the youngest chauf feur in the United States.

J. F. Carlson, who has been touring this part of the State recently, left San Francisco a few days ago in his Peerless with intentions of returning overland to Merced.

While at the National Automobile Company's new home the other day I saw a Franklin automobile, a handsome type of the modern chariot. It was the first of its kind ever shipped to the coast. The local company received a carload of these vehicles—four-cylinder runabouts—about a week ago and nearly all of them have been sold. The Franklin machine, at the Eastern automobile tournament on the Empire race track, July twenty-fifth, broke all the world's runabout records from one to ten miles.

Cuyler Lee, after completing his record run from Oakland to Del Monte last week, was pretty confident that he would hold it for a while, but no sooner had he offered two hundred dollars to any one who would eclipse his time than nearly a dozen of the automobilists returning from the Del Monte meet tried for a new record. All but Lou Andrews tried in vain, many being delayed by marshals of the various towns, and J. Keenan and C. Luckhardt were even arrested. Lou Andrews, however, got to Oakland without any delays and lowered the record of Lee, of six hours and five minutes, just exactly fifteen seconds. Mr. Andrews drove a Peerless.

In my report of the Del Monte races I stated that the second race was won by a "White" touring car, whereas it was won by a "White" Stanhope. It was not a "White" racing machine that won the third event, for as a matter of fact the company had no racing machine on the ground. It was an ordinary "White" touring car owned by F. A. Garbutt of Los Angeles that won the race.

There is to be a big race meet at Fresno next month under the auspices of the Fresno Automobile Club.

I am notified that the fastest time made from Del Monte to this city is four hours and thirty-three minutes. This record was made by C. A. Hawkins. The running time does not include time lost in repairing a puncture or through having taken the wrong road. —The Automobilist.

STAGE

Bernard Shaw's Problem

That accomplished copartnership for short seasons in California composed of Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin, is once more doing business at the old stand. And of course the box-office man at the Columbia is a more important individual than he usually is, for San Francisco theatregoers are duly grateful to Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin for vouchsafing them a brief season each year, of entertainment above the dead level of mediocrity along which the average road company treads its weary way. This year's company, however, as revealed in the opening production, will not bear comparison with any of its predecessors. Mrs. Whiffen and the Walcots, Lawrence D'Orsay and William Courtleigh, are missing and missed, for there are no worthy substitutes to share the honors with Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin, with the exception of Mr. George S. Titheradge, with whom we have had no previous acquaintance but who is unquestionably an artist. So Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin are the bright, particular stars of this year's aggregation, with no occasion to look to their histrionic laurels, and they are content, no doubt, to feel that they are supported by a company adequate for all purposes. Perhaps manager Dillingham thought that an introduction to Mr. George Bernard Shaw, the self-confessed mountebank of literature, the man who revels in the courage of his affectations, the artificial philosopher who has capitalized cynicism, and who believes that genius should wear a cap and bells that thrift might follow ostentation, would be sufficient to compensate us for any of the shortcomings in the personnel of the company. And I have no doubt that is the way the superficial public will look at it. Mr. Shaw is worth knowing, for despite his affected eccentricities he has genius, and as for the shortcomings, they are not such as to grieve, but merely to impel the institution of unfavorable comparison with last year's company which possessed far more talent than is to be found in any ordinary Broadway production. We should not expect an all-star cast every year. As for the play, it will suffice though it reveals no remarkable technical mastery, no profound knowledge of human nature, no psychology to excite rhapsody. Mr. Shaw's imagination is bourgeois. There are no vital men and women in "The Devil's Disciple," and there is no analysis of human nature and human emotions. In other words, Shaw is no Sudermann. He has not the creative ability of Ibsen, and he lacks the technical skill of Pinero. He has the cynicism of Wilde but not the facility of that genius for decisive phrasing, or the keen sense of humor to express himself in scintillating paradoxes. However "The Devil's Disciple" is a strong play which deals with the same people that were handled in "The Scarlet Letter," smug puritans of New England, who hated sin and sinners and who never understood the charity of Christianity. It is a play that thrills in spots, that stirs the emotions, and flutters the sympathetic chords, but after seeing it you go away dissatisfied, feeling that the author should write another act. The sensation that follows the final curtain is akin to that produced when you read a sensational column story in a newspaper only to find that you have been duped by somebody's ad. for pink pills that are good for pale people. You have followed the fortunes of the hero, a devil-may-care fellow who shocked the sensibilities of the pharisaical villagers by his unconventional indifference to religious restraints. He has been reared by a cruel mother whom he has learned to despise, and he has a contempt for the sniveling hypocrites with whom he is brought in contact. But he is a man at heart, indifferent to his fate, courageous and charitable. He lived in the days when the American colonies were being harassed by English soldiers and the action of the play takes place just as the Revolution has its inception. One day the arrest of the village minister for treason is ordered, and the hero, Richard Dudgeon, is taken by mistake. He conceals his identity to save the minister's life, and willingly goes to his doom. Meanwhile the minister learns the news, and starts off to join the colonists who have taken up arms. It appears that he has taken to flight and his young wife, believing him to be a coward and a scoundrel for permitting the sacrifice of Dudgeon, goes to the prison to save the latter by revealing his identity. She now despises her husband, falls in love with Dudgeon and begs him to save himself and fly with her. An hour later her husband comes in the nick of time to save Dudgeon, and then the curtain falls. The presumption is that the husband and wife are to be reunited, but the problem is, did she switch her affections back to the minister or did she continue to love the heroic Dudgeon ever after? It is not pleasant to contemplate the wife's predicament. Shaw tells the story in a succession of thrilling scenes that are well handled. The dialogue is apt, and the repartee is at times brilliant. But the play lacks symmetry, and the author's purpose is somewhat vague. The only thing clear about it is that he wished to enter a protest, in the final act, against cant and cruelty to children. Miller plays the rollicking hero in a way that holds the continuous interest of the audience. His interpretation of the part was intelligent, and the court-martial scene in which he was the central figure was animate and significant. Miss Anglin's Judith is a dramatic portraiture that would rank any woman as an accomplished artist. I have never been able to enthuse over Miss Anglin's work as some people do, because I have never been quite satisfied that her temperament was of a high order, but not a false note obtrudes in her performance this week. After the stars comes Mr. Titheradge, who played the minister as the part should be played. An important role for one act is that of Mrs. Dudgeon, played by Sara Dayton. Sara ranted vociferously and tried hard to prove that she was a very disagreeable old lady, but she didn't convince me that she was in earnest.

Didn't Want a Brunette Wife

Kathryn Osterman, the pretty blonde who was at the Orpheum some time since, has been made co-defendant with her husband, Mr. Rosenthal, in a most piquant suit for five thousand dollars damages. The plaintiff is Miss Josephine Victor, a Columbus actress. She sought an engagement in Miss Osterman's "Miss Petticoats" production and was told that they didn't want a blonde. Miss Victor agreed to dye her beautiful goldielocks a raven hue. But when she went back, after the metamorphosis, she was told the place she was after was already filled. This was not all. Miss Victor was engaged to a nice young man, one George Matthews, and when he saw her in her new wig he kicked at getting a brunette fiancee when he had wooed and won a beautiful blonde. Miss Victor was indignant, but the hair continued black, and George refused to stand for it. Hence the damage suit.

"My play," said Maeterlinck of "Joyzelle," his latest, "is the triumph of love and will over fatalities, and my heroine a spontaneous being of life, grace and love who, by the sheer force of her will and her love, triumphs over all obstacles." In spite of this beautiful theme "Joyzelle" did not prove the instant hit that was expected. The critics consider Maeterlinck aimed high and did not quite hit his mark. The playwright is a man of wonderful ambition and undoubted genius, and his critics think he has not yet done his greatest work. He used to write of the triumph of death over life. Now he writes of life and love triumphing over death and fate. Within a few years all his ideas have changed. He is in his way a reformer, who urges men to endeavor to find new motives to live, persevere and to triumph. His tastes are purely domestic and pastoral. He lives, when not in the Parisian turmoil, in a little Normandy cottage. His wife, who was Georgette Leblanc, loves town as well as her husband loves the country.

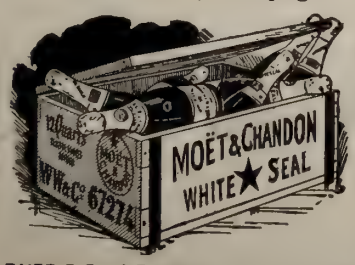
War Plays Draw Packed Houses



Though "Shenandoah's" artistry is by no means up to that of Bronson Howard's other works, big royalties are still drawn from the war-play. It is, with its background of powder and its Civil war environment, just the drama to draw big audiences and loads of enthusiasm from our G. A. R. visitors. The California has had record-breaking houses all this week. General MacArthur and staff were there on Monday night. Call it spread-eagleism if you will but the outburst of applause from boxes, orchestra, dress-circle and galleries when Sheridan's charger crossed the stage for a brief moment was thrilling. Lillian Kemble is a charming heroine and though Esther Lyon and Odette Tyler came before her, no invidious comparisons can be drawn. Miss Kemble is an actress who is sure to be a star of magnitude at some not distant day. The play is given a modern mounting even to the introduction of repeating rifles in the skirmishing. The uniforms of the soldiers suggest the Spanish war and the women instead of wearing the voluminous skirts of the Civil war period glide about the stage in the clinging robes of the Sadie Girl. The only actress in the picture was Phosa McAllister, who made much of a very small part and whose person, clothed in fitting costume, had all the charm of an old daguerreotype.

Having seen the "Shenandoah" side of the war and Sheridan's famous ride, "Cumberland '61" comes in as a neat companion play. Chronologically it precedes the Howard work. It is full of exciting scenes, a Kentucky feud coming to a focus when the North and South take up arms against each other. While it is a question whether it is well to keep the Civil war hatred alive in hearts of today, there is no question that both these plays are well adapted for occasions like the present. The Central, like the California, has had to turn away people who wanted to see "Cumberland '61," but were confronted by the S. R. O. sign. Veterans galore, in sombreros and badge-adorned, have filled the theatre, and exchanged reminiscences between acts. Miss Lawton has the role about which all the most interesting events figure, Alice Ainsley, the Southern girl. Mayall is of course the hero, but in "Cumberland '61" as in "Shenandoah" it is the heroine who carries the audience with her from start to finish, and captures most of the applause.

"The Dairy Farm"

There are character actors and character actors. Theodore Rook is a great one. "The Dairy Farm" is the usual kind of rural drama, dainty and comfortable. Theodore Rook brings it out of the commonplace, and sets it up as a rural drama above the average, by virtue of acting so clever that it is close to nature. Rook has the part of the crooked stick, Simon Krum, and he has played it over a thousand times; naturally it has "grown to him," so to speak. Edwards Davis as Nathan Newkirk, the hero, makes no pretensions to starship, and acts his part very manfully and minus the eccentricities which were looked for in the ex-preacher. Juliet Crosby has an interesting role—Lucy, "who never belonged to anybody"—which she invests with alternate comedy and pathos, moving the audience to the alternative emotions of laughter and tears. Oza Waldrop is quite a show in herself as "Minty," and plays up well to her grandfather of the cast—Joel the Peddler—enacted by Tony West, one of the Eastern importations for the production. Marie Howe, John Hynes, Zellah Covington, Howard Scott and the other worthy members of the stock do justice to their several parts. Simple as the play is, it gives a very enjoyable evening, and could easily enjoy a longer run than the one other week allotted it.

At Sea as to Her Identity

Mrs. Burton Harrison's novel, "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," was recently published. It is this novel from which the play takes its name which Florence Roberts will present for her opening bill at the Alcazar. It is said to be based upon something that happened in San Francisco many years ago, so people are trying to place the characters. The heroine is a woman who runs away with another man because her husband insists upon carrying on an intrigue before her eyes, and disgracing her in her own estimation and that of society. Years after she comes back that she may take a sub rosa look at her now grown-up daughter. She finds her husband married to the woman of his past. The unwelcome returned one is discovered in her disguise and shown the door. To parallel this story with a social happening here is what is occupying the tabbies on the summer hotel verandas ever since the book appeared. For the nonce gossip about the indiscreet of the present smart set has been suspended in favor of the unwelcome Mrs. Hatch.

Tyndall Demonstrating to "Standing Room Only"

Are we becoming Tyndallized? There was another very large audience at Steinway hall last Sunday evening, every seat in the large auditorium being taken. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall talked on "The Mastery of Fate," and he certainly brought out some interesting points for discussion. He alluded to the achievements of Mr. Luther Burbank, the "wizard of horticulture," as an example of what can be done in overcoming "fate," or natural tendencies. "Mr. Burbank, through the power of thought," Dr. McIvor-Tyndall reminded his hearers, "actually produced white 'blackberries.' . . . More than this, he can take a vile, ill-smelling and neglected weed, and by the power of thought in cultivation and selection, produce from it a flower of brilliancy and perfume." Those who have had the good fortune to be present at Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's psychological lectures this season are loud in their praise of the practical, scientific thought contained in them. Large classes have been formed for private instruction in the principles of psychic science as taught by the famous telepathist, and altogether there is an unusual interest being manifested in the study of the "great unknown." The lecture tomorrow night will be on "What is Thought?" On the following Sunday night Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will tell us "How to Read Thought." There will be demonstrations of the marvels of the mind, following each lecture.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"The Taming of Helen" will show the Miller-Anglin company at the Columbia in the play of Richard Harding Davis which had a three months' run at the Savoy last season. The play was founded on one of Davis's charming short stories, and deals with a struggling actress, a leading lady and an American heiress in London. There is a pretty love tale at the bottom of the plot, and the last act contains many entertaining bits of stage business. In this act Miss Anglin, who has the part of the actress, will appear in boy's clothes. There are Wednesday and Saturday matinees at the Columbia during the Miller-Anglin season. "Camille" comes next.

"Shenandoah" has enjoyed such a tremendous success at the California that an extra farewell performance of the great war play will be given tomorrow night. On Monday night the Neill-Morosco company will present Henry Arthur Jones's play, "Mrs. Dane's Defense." This play was given at the Columbia some years ago, with Margaret Anglin as the star. It is a strong drama, one of the strongest problem plays in fact that has ever been staged. Lillian Kemble and Frank MacVicars will have the principal roles.

"The Highwayman" will finish out the Tivoli comic opera season.

"In Harvard" will run all next week at the Grand. Tonight will be "University night," and special features suitable to the occasion will be introduced. Next will be the last week of the

Aug. 31—FLORENCE ROBERTS in "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch."

"Rogers' Brothers" season, and the last opportunity to see this charming company of singers and comedians, with the famous chorus. On Sunday, August thirtieth, the clever little Pollards, the juvenile Australians who appeared at the Tivoli a season or so ago, will begin their engagement at the Grand.

"The Dairy Farm" will easily crowd the Alcazar for another week. The first San Francisco production of "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," Mrs. Burton Harrison's play, will come on August thirty-first, when Florence Roberts opens her season.

Nothing has amused the town for moons to such an extent as the cute little nursery rhymes introduced in "The Big Little Princess" at Fischer's. About a dozen are demanded at every performance. "The Princess" should have a long and prosperous reign. "The Corn-querors" and "The Glad Hand" will be the next double bill.

Eugenie Thais Lawton will have a splendid opportunity to exploit her emotional talent in "Camille" at the Central, and Mayall as Armand will probably be one of the best Armands we have ever seen in San Francisco. Webster will be Pere Duval and Henry Shumer the Count de Varville. "Camille" is an important production for the Central, and should be a big drawing card.

Edwin Keough and Dorothy Ballard will make their first appearance in this city at the Orpheum this coming week, presenting the comedietta, "A Vaudeville Surprise." In one of the scenes incidental to the skit they will give the proposal scene from "Ingomar." The Fleury trio of novelty dancers will also be new here. Sam Edwards, for many years a prominent member of Frohman's forces, will appear, with two associate players, in "A Pass for Two." John Larkins and Dora Patterson, "national singers of coon songs," will be new. James Roberti, an operatic basso, and Arnold Billoski, lyric tenor, direct from Australia, will be heard in solos and duets. Both men have been greatly discussed in the Antipodes. Rosie Rendel, Heeley and Neely and John LeClair will offer new turns. So great a hit has Lew Hawkins, "the Chesterfield of minstrelsy," made that his engagement has been prolonged for an extra week.

At the Chutes will be the juggling Mathieus, club experts, Edward Poulter, "Happy Hooligan," Bandy and Wilson, the dancing duo, Hodges and Launchmere, the versatile colored couple, Harry Baker, a novelty musician, Jessie Dale, the girl baritone, and the Animatoscope. The five new baby lions in the zoo are a great card. —The Playgoer.

Developments in Lone Mountain District

The work being prosecuted in the Lone Mountain Mining District demonstrates that it will eclipse any district—containing its class of ores—that has ever been discovered. The country for miles is heavily mineralized and in nearly every instance where shafts have been sunk on the ledge rich ore and in paying quantities has been found. At present large quantities of ore are being shipped from this district and the property owners are eagerly looking forward to the advent of the railroad. The ore is of a fluxing nature and smelters are willing to pay a bonus for the privilege of treating it. So with the advent of the railroad ore of a very low grade can be made to yield a profit. In the shafts so far sunk on the main contact ledge the quartz rarely falls below an average of twenty dollars a ton, and in many instances the average value is from forty to one hundred dollars a ton. Among the many properties of this district that have encountered high grade ore are the "Tonopah Monarch," "General Thomas," "Lynch & O'Meara," "Princess Maude Gold Mining Company," "Lone Mountain Mining Co.," "Paymaster Mining Co." and the "Horn Silver." Some of the ore encountered in these properties averages from one hundred dollars to three hundred and fifty dollars per ton. From present indications the "Princess Maude" promises to become a famous producer, as the ledge has been a strong one from the very grass roots, carrying high values. The shaft has nearly reached the one hundred-foot level and will be continued to the two hundred-foot level before much drifting is done. The ledge varies from five to eight feet, part of which is ore of a very high grade. The ledge has improved greatly in the last ten feet sunk in the shaft and it is likely that the whole ledge will before long be of high grade ore. Exhaustive experiments are being made by this company and the Lone Mountain Mining Company (which owns the adjoining property) and if successful a concentrator will be erected to work the second class ores of the two mines.

Scheel and His Concert

Considering the long musical fast of the summer months and how great a favorite Mr. Fritz Scheel is with San Francisean music-lovers, the audience which listened to the opening symphony concert at the Grand Opera House last Friday afternoon cannot very well be disposed of with the trite and convenient phrase, "large and enthusiastic." Nor can one get off by saying that "what was lacking in number was made up in appreciation." The truth is, that the audience was even less discriminating than usual. The majority was composed of miserable sinners who should down on their knees, penitent-wise, declaring: "We did that which we ought not to have done: we left undone that which it became us to do, and there is no taste in us." The slow movement of the Schumann Symphonie in C major—that beautiful bit of infinity—rendered as it was with admirable artistry, won but a few polite pats; while the Tschaikowsky "Divertimento," a cheap thing, of almost vaudivillian vulgarity, came within a hand-clap or two of an encore. Art, I suppose, cannot get along without the support of the Philistine, and the insupportable Philistine cannot, I suppose, get along without his (or her) (or its) "Divertimento." Well, God's people had the Adagio Expressivo, and their women folk (from Grieg's "Peer Gynt") "La Mort d'Ase," full of strange tears, and "La Danse d'Anitra," dainty, feminine, fetching. There was Mendelssohn, to begin with—for the classicists; there was Wagner, to wind up with—for the moderns. And for every one there was Fritz Scheel (more of him than ever), delicate, subtle, legitimate, a born leader of—musicians.

Although the second concert under the direction of Fritz Scheel will not take place until next Tuesday afternoon, the demand for seats is already so great that it will be difficult to obtain seats after a few days when the box office has opened. The success of the first concert was simply astonishing. Everybody is enthusiastic over the result. Professional musicians paid Scheel the greatest compliment ever paid to any symphony leader in this city by attending the concert in a body. The next program will even be more interesting than the first. The dates of the seven remaining symphony concerts have been again changed. The following are the dates: Tuesdays in September, instead of Fridays, and the first Tuesday in October.

New Tivoli Grand Opera Season

It has been decided by the Tivoli management not to run "The Fortune Teller" in between "The Highwayman" and the opening of the grand opera season. Anna Lichter is not to come West, after all. When the fair Anna left here, in the midst of her last Tivoli engagement, she was not feeling in a genial mood. Her husband, the big German baritone, was not needed to sing principal roles and Miss Lichter didn't like to see hubby's feelings slighted, and so she left the company and the city. But "The Fortune Teller" won't be missed. The new grand opera season promises to be a brilliant one. It is to be opened in the old Tivoli on Monday, August thirty-first, and will be transferred to the new opera house when the latter is finished. Among the new works to be performed are Leoncavallo's "Zaza" and Cilea's "Adrienne Lecouvreur," neither of which has ever been performed in the United States. That will be quite an honor for San Francisco, though we in a way became used to such honors when "La Boheme" had its premier here. By the way Leoncavallo's "Boheme" is talked of for this grand opera season, also Giordano's "Fedora" and all the favorites of last season will be repeated. In the company are Agostini, La Spada and Dado who sang here last season; and De Benedetto, dramatic soprano from Naples, Marchesini, contralto, Tromben, soprano from Venice, Gregoretto, baritone, Zanini, also a baritone, Ischierdo and Tedeschi, tenors. The tenors are said to be exceptionally good and Tedeschi is the youngest tenor in Italy.

Hubert Wilke, the baritone, remembered here as the Pied Piper of Hamelin, will have an important role in the forthcoming production of "The Yankee Consul," the new comic opera by Henry M. Blossom, Jr. and Alfred G. Robyn. Mr. Wilke was a member of McCaull's opera company which included De Wolf Hopper, Digby Bell, Marion Manola, Jeff de Angelis and Laura Joyce Bell. Last season he was with "The Jolly Musketeer."

Futures at the Lyric

The new Lyric hall is not the Alhambra, as many thought, but old "B. B." hall which has been leased by Will Greenbaum and by the aid of decorators transformed into one of the prettiest concert halls San Francisco has ever owned. "Everyman," the morality play, is to be the opening attraction, with the original London company under Ben Gheet's management. Then will come "Gussie" Cottlow, the little pianist who played here some years ago with the Bauer symphony orchestra. The Metropolitan Opera House orchestra with J. S. Duss conducting and Madame Nordica and Mrs. Fiske the soloists, will appear at the Alhambra, followed by Ellery's Royal Italian band. Other attractions arranged by impresario Greenbaum are Oumroff, the Bohemian basso, Franko the violinist, Schumann Heink, Harold Bauer, the Burton Holmes lectures, and Sunday "Pops." Saturday "Pops" were introduced here by Sigmund Beel and Mrs. Carmichael Carr, and Sunday morning concerts by Scheel's orchestra, but the Greenbaum "Pops" are to be quite different in scope and treatment.

The Row Over Parsifal

Frau Cosina Wagner, the widow of the great composer, is, say the despatches, doing all in her power to prevent the production of "Parsifal" in this country. This extraordinary compound of opera and sacred mystery play has hitherto been the exclusive property of the Bayreuth Festspielhaus, and to witness a performance of it Wagner enthusiasts had to travel many weary miles and put up with much inconvenience and extortion. The Wagner heirs have reaped great profits from the exclusive right to this one work, though their royalties from the master's other dramas have not been inconsiderable. It is said that Manager Conried purchased the score of "Parsifal" under an agreement not to use it for public performance. If so he will not be able to avoid trouble, for our courts have decided that the printing of an orchestral score and the accompanying instrumental parts does not constitute publication in the sense of carrying with it performing rights.

Anna Wood Coming

The friends of Anna Miller Wood, the mezzo contralto, may look forward to seeing her in the spring. Miss Wood will make an extended tour of the Pacific coast with Arthur Foote, the distinguished pianist and composer. They will give concerts in all the large cities. The coming of Arthur Foote will be as great an event as Edward MacDowell's visit, for Foote is a great composer. A feature of the programs are to be some of Mr. Foote's latest songs, especially written for Miss Wood.

An "evening of song" will be given at H. B. Pasmore's studio next Friday evening, when the program will be contributed by Miss Rose Calejian, Miss Julia Kinsie and Miss Elizabeth Sandman, sopranos, Miss Anna Obermuller, contralto, Raymond Deane, baritone, and M. E. Scott, bass, with Dorothy Pasmore in cello solos. The affair is invitational.

All the musical people are returning to town. Robert Tolmie has returned from Trinity county, where he enjoyed a hunting trip. Hother Wismer is back from Honolulu and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Fickenscher have returned from Shasta.

Llewellyn Hughes, son of Mr. Hughes, the choral director of Oakland, is touring England with his violin and meeting with much success. —The Music Critic.

The Man Who Had No Friends

Once upon a time there lived a Man of Millions. He was a very Nice Man as Nice Men Go but something had been Left Out of his Make-up by Dame Nature, and somehow or other he never could become Popular.

There are men who can Get Along without being Popular. This one Couldn't. He looked around at his Club and saw men with Empty Heads and Emptier Purses surrounded by Other Men, basking in the Sunlight of Genial Companionship, while he with his Well Filled Head and Better Filled Portemonnaie was left coldly without the Circle. He spent a Lot of Money giving Dinners and Suppers, he paid for Drinks right and left, smiled on the Offspring of Matchmaking Mammas, encouraged struggling Geniuses by buying their Works of Art, made speeches at Charitable Affairs, bought Fancy Work from Old Gentlewomen of Decayed Fortune, listened to Book Agents and subscribed for Preposterous Editions de Luxe—in short this Nice Man did Everything he could to Buy Friendship. But he Failed. He had Acquaintances, some who posed as Intimates, a string of Toadies who saw in him the Millionaire, but of Friends he had not One.

He denied himself none of the Creature Comforts or the luxuries that are to be had for money, but he longed for a few Choice Companions, men of Culture and possessing the same Mental Graces with which he was endowed, but those were the men that seemed to Shun him. Vulgar Politicians fawned upon him but he Detested them. They ran him for Office, and the People elected him, because he had so much money they knew he could afford to be Honest. Their Support was purely Selfish. They disliked him as a Man but were eager to Use him as a Servant.

Inspired by that same quality of Selfishness his fellow club-men availed themselves of his Executive Ability, but they never Hailed him as a Good Fellow, a fact that impressed itself upon him and rendered him Morose.

And so the Man went his way, surrounded by all the Luxuries of Life, but lacking all its Deeper Joys—Lonely and Unloved, a Man without Friends.

LETTERS

"A Parish of Two"

This is a romantic and exciting love story told through the medium of the correspondence of two men. The Douglas Dayton letters are the work of Henry Goelet McVicar, and the Percy Dashiel correspondence is contributed by Percy Collins, behind which pen it is said that a well-known New York clergyman is concealing his identity. Douglas Dayton is an idle society man uncongenially married, though we are not taken further into his domestic affairs. Apparently his only complaint of his wife is that she is "too good," but perhaps that is enough. Percy Dashiel, his intimate friend and confidant, is a Massachusetts clergyman who has met with an accident which will confine him to a wheeled chair for the remainder of his life, and of necessity he has had to resign his parish work, and view the world through the medium of books and letters. Douglas Dayton has betaken himself to the South in order to kill time, and there he falls in love with a most beautiful and adorable specimen of womanhood. Beauty is handicapped by a husband whom she has no use for, but as Douglas has a like incumbrance in the shape of a wife, honors are about even. The wife, to be sure, is far away in New York, so it is not necessary to mention her, but the husband has an inconvenient habit of being right there, even to the extent of offering his advice as to trains when he comes upon Douglas and the lady planning an elopement. Since we know the gentleman only through our interceptance of the correspondence of the impassioned lover, it is a matter of course that he should not be endowed with any of the virtues, all of which are reserved for beauty in distress. The Reverend Percy appears to have as little mental strength as physical, for he never hits a straight blow and tells Douglas in plain words that there is a "shalt not" to apply to his case. On the contrary, he temporizes, offers argument, sees the other side, and makes the way of the transgressor as easy as he can. The lady plays fast and loose, draws her lover on and dismisses him, but always keeps him within call. Probably she is considering all the while that having one wife already, he is safe from predatory females. Douglas has a comfortable view that his ex-ministerial friend is like one dead and confidences given to him are buried. Unfortunately there is no seal of secrecy over the Protestant confessional, so when Douglas sends his spiritual advisor the correspondence which has passed between him and his lady fair, we feel instinctively that here is a boomerang which he has provided for his own undoing. The husband in the case meets with a tragic fate, and the lady, somewhat late in the day, "gets on to herself," in the language of the street. Now we go back a bit. Percy Dashiel, in his younger days, had had a romantic attachment for a beautiful girl whose acquaintance he picked up on a railroad train. He did not speak betimes and the fair one married some one else. Whom, he never knew, for he lost trace of her and hers. She comes, a widow, to visit his sister, and falls in love over again, notwithstanding the paralyzed and crippled state in which she finds her erstwhile lover. She too, has the confession habit, so the "parish of one" becomes a parish of two. Percy Dashiel must have been abominably obtuse not to be able to fit together the two halves of the puzzle, for of course his beloved Mary is no other than the "Mrs. B." who has enchanted Douglas. In order to "brace her up" Percy reads her a letter from one in like position, and behold! it is one of her own impassioned epistles to her erstwhile lover, whom she has forgotten as completely as she has her late husband, who, poor fellow, appears to have had good cause for his treatment of her. Then, of course there are accusation, recrimination, death and repentance. Considering that Percy Dashiel refers so often to his weak hands, he manages to write ponderous letters, some of which fill more than twenty printed pages. Possibly his invalid state is excuse enough for attributing to Dean Swift the sentiments of Thomas Carlyle, but even that does not justify him in calling

"If thy heart fail thee Climb not at all"

a couplet. The couplet to which he refers (the above is attributed to Queen Elizabeth) was the joint production of Her Majesty and Sir Walter Raleigh. Sir Walter scratched on a pane of glass with the diamond in his ring, the sentiment:

"Fain would I climb but that I fear to fall," and Elizabeth's attention being attracted to it she placed underneath the line:

"If thy heart fail thee, wherefore climb at all?"

There are many passages in this book which, on the whole, make good summer reading. It probably gives a fairly accurate view of both the social and the clerical view of dallying with the seventh commandment—playing with fire and either dexterously dropping the brand at the critical moment or else having a special providence step in to quench the fire. [D. Lothrop of Boston is the publisher.] —The Bookworm.

Victor Hugo's Epigrams

From "The Man Who Laughs."

The solitary is the diminutive of the savage, accepted by civilization. One is all the more alone when one is roaming about. . . . A crowd satisfies, in a measure, the taste which one has for the desert.

Mary Stuart to Elizabeth: "Your aversion to marriage comes from the fact that you do not wish to lose the liberty of causing love to be made to you."

The recoils of pride in an inverse sense of our vices lead us to the contrary vices. . . . To be too much on the defensive indicates a secret desire of being attracted. She who is shy is not severe.

To make marriage "prosy" by making it decent—can anything more gross be conceived? How stupid that there should no longer be any evil in loving!

It is sometimes more difficult to be second than first. Less genius is required, but more courage. The first, intoxicated with the innovation, may have been ignorant of the danger; the second sees the abyss, and casts himself into it.

"Fun" is like "cant," like "humor," a specially untranslatable word. Fun is to farce, what pepper is to salt. To enter a house, to smash a costly mirror, to smash the family portraits, to poison the dog, to put a cat in the aviary, this is called "having a bit of fun." . . . Fun would be proud if it had broken the arms of the Venus de Milo.

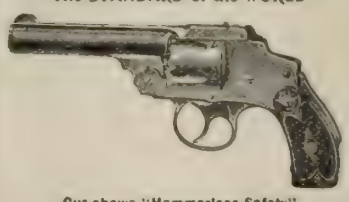
Never allow any one to render you a service. People will take advantage of it. Never let yourself be caught in the very act of starvation. People will succor you. . . . A weakness of the stomach, and there you are, chained for life. To be under obligation is to be imposed upon. . . . It is thus that the rich take the poor prisoners. That birdlime of the good action committed upon you, besmears you, and you are mired forever.

The privileges awarded to the "engaged" have a frontier which it is easy to overstep.

Versus: Love—do you know how the good God lights that fire? He places the woman below, the devil between the two, the man on the devil. A match, that is to say a glance, and behold, everything flames up.

Aristocracies take pride in what women regard as a humiliation,—age; but women and aristocracies cherish the same illusion that they are well preserved.

After a certain degree of terror, one becomes terrible. He who fears everything, no longer fears anything.



Truth is offensive to him who lives on fiction. He who has a thirst for flattery vomits up the real which he has drunk unwittingly. —The Gleaner.

The Prodding of Roosevelt

It is hard to restrain one's admiration for the consummate skill employed by Harper's Weekly and the New York Sun in their efforts to turn public sentiment against President Roosevelt. Not daring to attack him openly through fear of exposing the animus of their opposition, they are pursuing a covert system of warfare which is not only annoying to the President but also very effective, since it brings conviction to people who, though they resent harsh criticism of the Nation's Chief Magistrate, are inclined to give ear to and weigh what appears to be friendly advice and dignified and intelligent comment. Both papers appreciate the fact that Roosevelt enjoys considerable popular esteem, and that he is the logical candidate of the Republican party in the coming campaign. The moneyed interests which they represent are opposed to him, and while they are normally Republicans, self-interest directs their politics, and they will support the Democratic ticket providing they can secure the nomination of Grover Cleveland or one of his understudies. Meanwhile their organs will covertly attack the President by artful deprecation, delicate sarcasm, flippant criticism and plausible detraction. That they are rapidly molding public opinion there is not the slightest doubt. Influential rural editors throughout the country keep in touch with national politics through the medium of the Sun and the Weekly, and their utterances are frequently nothing more than a rehash of what they have read in those brilliantly edited papers. Moreover many of the editorials that appear in those papers are reprinted by publications in many States. Consequently the covert warfare is bound to have considerable effect. And as Roosevelt is not remarkable for tact, or for dignity, or for statesmanship, his enemies have many opportunities to administer deadly thrusts. They do not fail to praise him for what good he has done, for in that way they affect friendship, but at the same time they jolt him for his egotism, they josh him for his platitudes about race-suicide, they question his uncertain financial policy, they ridicule his strenuousness, they deprecate his iconoclastic attitude toward the traditions of the White House, they smash him for his favoritism toward Wood, and they shed tears over his discourtesy to Miles. But they pretend to be eager to promote his welfare, and to be anxious for the success of his administration. At the same time they are awfully sorry that he has not a more equable temperament. Their fondness for him is somewhat akin to that of the late Thomas B. Reed, who said that he couldn't help admiring Roosevelt for his enthusiasm over his own discovery of the Ten Commandments.

The Miles Incident

At present the Miles incident is the favorite topic of the detractors of Roosevelt. Subsequent to the embalmed beef scandal and up to the day of his retirement they denounced Miles as a demagogue, a poseur, a charlatan and a political trickster, but since his return to private life they have been recalling all the various incidents of his brilliant military career and censuring the President for having snubbed him cold-bloodedly just as he was severing his connection with the government he had so long and faithfully served. The Miles incident is being used to alienate the affections of the Grand Army, of which the gallant soldier is an honored member, just as the appointment of negroes to office was harped upon to excite the indignation of Southerners. It is argued that the President should have repressed his prejudice against the retiring commander long enough to indulge in a few high encomiums on his record as a hero. But perhaps it wasn't entirely personal prejudice that prompted the President to let Miles retire to private life without the soothing unction of a few expressions of gratitude for the services he had rendered. For several years Miles has been conducting himself in a manner highly prejudicial to the good of the service. He has outraged all the canons that govern the conduct of an army officer. He was dealt with leniently and with phenomenal forbearance, probably for the reason that it was thought he was eager for summary action so that he could pose as a martyr and run for President. He was a thorn in the flesh of two Administrations, and he never lost an opportunity to show his contempt for the War Department. No doubt he was unjustly humiliated during the war with Spain, but he should have conducted himself with dignity and not in a manner to give bad example. To have glorified him on his retirement would have been to approve the conduct of which he was guilty, and that is probably the view taken by President Roosevelt. Miles has a fine record as a soldier but a bad one as Captain-General of the army, and it would not be advisable to put a premium on the methods which he pursued during the last few years. Roosevelt is not an ideal President. He lacks dignity and repose, and he has wavered when it appeared to him that firmness in pursuit of a policy was likely to array powerful influences against him, but he should not be harshly criticised for not having given General Miles a hot-air bath.

A Model Public Prosecutor

Less than two years ago Joseph Wingate Folk was unknown outside the borders of Missouri. In less than two years his fame has spread all over these United States. The erstwhile obscure Circuit Attorney of St. Louis now enjoys a national reputation of such a high order that he is being discussed as an available man for the Presidency. There is not much likelihood of his receiving the nomination from the next Democratic National Convention, but he will surely be the next Governor of Missouri, and thereafter, unless something occurs to mar his record, he will be regarded as an available man for the high office of Chief Magistrate of the country. How did Joseph Wingate Folk so suddenly focus the attention of a great nation upon himself? By what master stroke did he win the confidence of the people and cause himself to be marked as a man worthy of promotion to the office which should be the object of every American's aspirations? The answer to these questions is that he merely performed his duty. He did not perform it perfunctorily, as most officials are content to do, not according to the letter alone, but in accordance also with the spirit of the law governing the office to which he was elected. He stands today as a luminous exemplar of what a conscientious and efficient public servant should be, and he has pointed the way to every public prosecutor in the country. By his achievements he has shown that a public prosecutor is not a mere administrative officer, a functionary whose sole duty is to conduct the prosecution of people charged with crime after the machinery of the law has been set in motion by some other person. He has demonstrated that a public prosecutor who is cognizant of his powers, and who has the courage to execute them, is a very important individual, and that he does not have to wait for a third party to take the initiative when a crime has been committed. The prosecution of the St. Louis boodlers was started on nothing stronger than a hint contained in a brief paragraph which appeared in a daily paper. It was a chronicling of rumors to the effect that a fund for bribery had been placed in safe deposit boxes, and that there was trouble over the division thereof. That was all, but Folk read it and he decided to investigate.

The Crusade Against Boodle

About that time it was rumored in St. Louis newspaper and political circles that there had been war between one of the magnates of the Suburban Railroad Company and the members of the Municipal Assembly, which corresponds to our Board of Supervisors. The company, it was said, had put one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars in safe deposit boxes for the purpose of securing, by bribery, the passage of a certain ordinance. The officials "delivered the goods," but a court enjoined the company from exercising any rights under the ordinance. It appeared that there were two keys held by the guardians of the funds, one by the bribers and the other by the corrupt officials, and that no money could be removed without the consent of both. The company, unable to enjoy the fruits of its corruption, sought to recover the money, but the officials objected. After a little while an attorney for the crooked assemblymen decided to make a few of the facts public in the hope of scaring the railroad magnates. That is how the hint got into a newspaper. As soon as Folk read the paragraph he began issuing subpoenas by the score and the next day he was busy interviewing railroad officials, municipal employes and newspaper men. Not one of them gave him a scrap of evidence. All stolidly denied acquaintance with any information that could be of benefit to the State. But the Circuit Attorney gave out no news as to what had occurred at any of the interviews. He assumed a wise and ominous look which created the impression that he was in possession of important information. The next day he summoned the president of the railroad and a prominent brewer's agent, and he said to them, "Unless you go before the Grand Jury within forty-eight hours and tell all that you know about bribery matters I shall send you both to the penitentiary." It was a "bluff," but both men left the office fully convinced that he had sufficient information with which to carry out his threat. They did as he suggested, made a clean breast of the affair, and then there was consternation among the boodlers. All sorts of powerful influences were brought to bear on the Circuit Attorney, but in vain. Before anybody knew what his next move would be he visited the bank where the corruption fund was held, and he had recourse to another bluff. "Unless you give me access to the box within fifteen minutes," he said to one of the bank officials, "I shall cause your arrest as accessory to the crime." The official gave him the keys. The first crook tried was Emile Meysenberg, a member of the Assembly. It was thought that the case against him was weak but Folk prosecuted him and secured a verdict of guilty. The consternation produced by that verdict caused many of the boodlers to take flight. Charles Kratz, councilman, went to Mexico, where he is today, but Folk expects to extradite him. John K. Murrell, a member of the House of Delegates, also levanted to Mexico, but returned after weeks of miserable wanderings and became a State's witness. Julius Lehman, a former member of the House of Delegates, was indicted for perjury for swearing before the Grand Jury that he knew nothing of the Suburban deal. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and he is still to be tried for bribery. Several others were indicted for both crimes and are to be tried, but meanwhile the courts of St. Louis have been busy, with the result that eight other ex-members of the House of Delegates have been convicted either of bribery or perjury, and some for both. From the Suburban case Mr. Folk branched out into an investigation of all municipal legislation enacted during the last ten years. He convicted Robert M. Snyder, the promoter of a railroad bill, and he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Out of that case grew the cases of John H. Schmettle and Harry A. Faulkner, former members of the House of Delegates who were convicted of perjury and sent to the penitentiary. Mr. Folk also secured the indictment of two wealthy brewers who had signed the promissory notes on which the bribe money was obtained from the bank. One of the brewers was in Egypt when the indictment was presented, and he has remained abroad ever since. The other brewer was tried and acquitted. This was the only defeat Folk suffered. The court held that the prosecution had failed to show that the brewer knew the purpose to which the money was to be put. The various trials led from one unlawful deal to another, and presently Edward Butler, the veteran political boss of St. Louis, was entangled. He was indicted for offering a bribe to a member of the Board of Health to secure a garbage contract. While he was on trial Mr. Folk drew him farther into the net, and secured his indictment for bribery in connection with a lighting bill. The members of the House of Delegates received forty-seven thousand dollars for passing the lighting bill, and divided the money equally between nineteen of them at a birthday party at the house of one member. Butler was convicted on the first charge and is awaiting trial on the second. Altogether Folk has secured the conviction of fourteen boodlers, several of whom are very rich men. The cases which remain on the docket will probably not all be tried before the Circuit Attorney's term of office expires. And by the way, his crusade against corruption has not been confined to St. Louis. He unmasked a fine pack of rogues in the Legislature. He forced the Lieutenant-Governor to "squeal" on his "pals," showing up a sand-bagging system more perfect than any that was ever operated in dear old Sacramento, the favorite habitat of Colonel Mazuma. Mr. Folk's capacity for work is infinite, but he has simply been doing his duty as a public prosecutor. The opportunity which he seized has been within the grasp of nearly every district attorney elected in this city in the last twenty years. If there were more men of his character in public office boodling would not be popularly regarded as a venial offence.

The Lament of Charlotte

Charlotte Perkins Stetson Gilman was so abnormally quiet after her latest adventure in the matrimonial field that there was beginning to arise a reasonable hope that either she had subsided or her new husband was able to manage her. However, the hope was vain. She has broken out again in the same old place, and the burden of her plaint is that marriage is a failure. What she wants no one knows, but perhaps if she were as honest as a very small girl who had been indulging herself in tantrums, she would acknowledge that it is a spanking. According to the Stetsonian (or Gilmanian) view, love is not enough upon which to found a home. It is unjust, unfair, and un- several other things that a man should have his wife and the world too, while a wife must content herself with only a husband. He goes to his daily occupation and meets people, while she stays at home alone. She is dependent upon him for companionship, amusement, entertainment and all else. Her children take her time and strength and household cares absorb her energies. Meanwhile the husband, at work in office or shop, is, on the Stetsonian-Gilmanian method of reasoning, having a high old time independent of wifie and the chicks. And it is all wrong, so there! If matters really were approximately as this unbalanced reformer represents, women would indeed be having a sorry time of it, but there is only one grave fault to be found with her picture. It is absolutely and altogether untrue. The woman who marries a man of moderate means and does what her contract of wifehood binds her to do not only does not need "the world" in addition to her husband, but she has neither time nor inclination for outside affairs. If she prefers a business life, she has no right to marry. If she is not willing to oversee the housekeeping she has married under false pretenses. Marriage does not cut a woman off from friends of her own sex. A married woman has no moral right to make friends of men who are not the friends of her husband. Presumably, in marrying him she has specified that she prefers his society to the exclusion of others. Friends of the other sex she may have and keep, but escorts, gallants, lovers, she may not, if she cares to keep on a respectable footing. The woman who is going to write to the papers about it because after marriage she finds her husband objecting to lovers, is too much of a fool to enter into even the Stetsonian calculations. A business or professional man has as little time for enjoyment during the day, if he attends to his business, as his wife has if she attends to hers. The woman who complains of being tied fast to household drudgery in these days probably spends as much time lamenting her hard lot as she does in her work. There was a time when all the labor of the house fell upon the shoulders of the woman, who had no help but such as her children could give. When wool and cotton were dyed, spun and woven, and the family garments made; when all the meats were cured at home, and herbs gathered and dried for medicinal uses; when vegetables were stored for winter use, counterpanes pieced and quilted, spices ground, candles moulded, and a thousand and one other occupations carried on in spite of large families and little assistance, women assuredly had a hard time, but they were kept too busy to have time to lament their lot. The women of the poorer classes today have all they can do in their waking hours, but they do not complain, nor is Charlotte Perkins Stetson-Gilman taking up cudgels in their behalf. Lamentations set in with leisure, and it is the women who are doing all the complaining. They find themselves overburdened by their half-dozen club meetings in the course of the week and the perusal of the daily novel. They picture business life as a delightful experience which would take them among men, who, of course, could not resist their attractions, so that office or shop would immediately take on the aspect of a social function. Fortunately for them, there is little danger that they will ever seriously occupy themselves with any employment, for if they were to do so there would be speedy disillusionment. In spite of the funny column writers, the sporty typewriter and the frisky bookkeeper are the rare exceptions, and the women of the business world are held more strictly to their tasks than are the housekeepers who excite the Stetsonian compassion. Marriage is not a foretaste of Paradise and it is not designed that it should be, but there need be no more nor greater disappointments than in other walks of life. Making the best of things is as necessary there as elsewhere in the world, and if Charlotte Perkins Stetson Gilman is dissatisfied a second time perhaps she had better place some of the blame on herself as well as on marriage as an institution.

A magnificent display of creations by such famous Paris and Vienna modistes as Mme. Sarah Mayer, Maurice Mayer, Braunstein, Beer, Blanche Lebouvier, Driscoll, Pardoux and Blum-Gerson will be shown at The Emporium Opening Fall Exhibit, which begins Monday, August thirty-first.

Negative Tragedies

BY HARRY COWELL

A cloak of appearances hides Life from the eyes of the ignorant. To the "mostly fools" the Realities are as the unveiled face of God: one may not look upon them and live. That cravens might survive and people the earth, the Devil invented the lie. Therein is the salvation of the weak. Now and then a man of culture, learned in the art of seeing "the object as in itself it really is," has the hardihood, not only to "do" undraped bodies of Life from the life, but also to make noble nudes of its souls—to the delectation of the Children of Light, who stand before the pictures mute with admiration; to the dismay of the Philistines, who, turning their backs upon the truth, flee as from white terror or crimson shame.

Now it requires neither the sinless sight of the cultured, nor the bravery that comes of looking facts in the face (nor yet any very great skill), to see and set forth, rough-sketchwise, the undraped souls of Life's Negative Tragedies. And because the world, bent upon the business of Mammon, criminally negligent of eye as it ever is, rides roughshod over them; and because those who have depicted once and for all time the souls of Life's Positive Tragedies have overlooked them: any seeing eye may direct any sympathetic hand to draw a rude figure with outstretched arms of the spiritual reality of Negative Tragedies, as a signpost to warn the careless or as a cross to ask a tear of the thoughtful.

That a certain fateful something looked forward to does not happen—here is the tragic element of a Negative Tragedy. It has, not so much "the tempestuous loveliness of terror," as a calm heart-breaking beauty all its own. The following is rough-sketched from life:

Imagine a maiden designed in one of Nature's happiest moods for love. Dolls are her childhood's one delight. Grown older, the shadowy lips of little spirits, of babes unborn, seek her budding breast o'nights and make her dream of motherhood. (Dear angular, cat-loving reader, do not denounce her as "unmaidenly." Her desires are purer and more strangely beautiful than the white radiance of the stars that smile upon her sweetly troubled sleep. If such dreams never came to you, asleep or awake, it is because of a defect in your original make-up, because you are none other than a mistake of Nature's—an old maid. And she, mind you, dreams of motherhood rather than of man.) Vague longings, with all the haunting beauty of things vague and mysterious, commove her, the daughter of ten thousand mothers, for many a long, indefinite day before they resolve themselves into one all-embracing word —Love. The cloistral silence of her soul is disturbed, now by some half-articulate whispering of the wind, again by a bird's song almost understood; and her sighs are mingled with those of the sea. For her the scent of flowers has she knows not what significance. Spring has a message for her, so has music; but listen she never so breathlessly, the purport of neither is clear.

The springs pass, hidden things are revealed, and more than once in imagination she is wife and mother. One ambition after another she shares for a day with her strong-minded sisters and her yet stronger-minded brethren; yet in her heart of hearts she is all the while aware that her one desire is, not to be famous, not even to be loved, but to love. Man, the means, is now more to her than motherhood, the end. And children are incidents (looked forward to with delight, it is true, but still incidents) in the life of love. Long ago she had learned that for her fastidious self motherhood without love was a spiritual impossibility. Many have wooed her—for she is beautiful, and her breasts, like May blossoms, give forth a perfume that lures from afar the honey-loving heart of man—but not the possible father of her little ones. He—her ideal—is of course somewhere in the wide world, seeking her. Circumstance, however, seems to be ever raising between them as it were a wall, adamantine, insurmountable.

Meanwhile the flight of time finds her the "woman of thirty." And only too well she knows that the loveliness of woman is but a twilight or two longer than that of the flower; that the days of her gold-green youth are even as the days of grass. Were Death to call for her today, he would find her ignorant of all that Love has to teach the soul of woman; and though he should keep his distance for ten, fifteen, or twenty years; to have seen forty, forty-five, or fifty snows—is not that as fatal to motherhood as Death himself?

In spite of a temptation that every day grows stronger, this woman of thirty is not a whit less fastidious than was the girl of twenty. The clock is ticking away her chance of acquiring the liberal education of Love, of knowing the joys and sorrows of maternity, of fulfilling the design of Nature. None the less is she faithful to her ideal, and more than once in imagination is she wife and mother. Men still come to woo, but among them is not found the possible father of her "dream children." As of old, the flesh and blood children of other women adore her, but now when she smiles on them I weep.

As I glance over these rough lines which were meant to suggest the soul, the real inwardness, of a Negative Tragedy, I know myself for a class-mate of that schoolboy who wrote under his drawing: "This is a horse."

An Historical Theft

For nearly a century the Democratic party has managed to conduct its own party affairs without outside interference. Whenever it has entered National campaigns, fighting for real democracy, the rank and file of the party have been true, loyal and enthusiastic, and it has twice achieved success, since the Civil war, when fighting under the old banner of Jefferson and Jackson. In the Greeley campaign the managers, disheartened by defeat, led the Democratic forces into ambush; Greeley had been the lifelong foe of the Democratic party and Gratz Brown was his disciple, and his proper running mate. Acting under the delusive hope that these nominations would draw a large, dissatisfied Republican element to the support of the ticket, it was placed in the field and Jeffersonian Democrats were asked to aid in electing it. The Democratic voters, a large portion of them at least, supported the ticket in a listless, half-hearted way; they sat dejectedly down to the banquet prepared for them; they did not like crow but they ate it as though they enjoyed it. The Greeley-Brown combination drew no strength from the Republicans, and the inevitable result of this foolish experiment was the most disastrous defeat the party had ever sustained. Poor old Greeley lost his reason, and died a heart-broken man, and the Democratic party came near being crushed forever by the political mistakes of its leaders.

But democratic principles must triumph if this country is to remain a republic. Gradually the past was forgotten and the party again came together, recovered from its lethargy and lined up again, with the determination of giving another battle to its triumphant foe. Tilden was nominated against the will of "the bosses," and the slogan in this battle was "Clean politics, and turn the rascals out." He was elected by an honest majority, and his election was conceded for months by every one save Zachariah Chandler, Senator from Michigan, who claimed that fraud had been committed in Oregon, Louisiana, Florida and South Carolina, which if unearthed would give the Presidential office to Hayes.

Again were our leaders hoodwinked and deceived. The Electoral Commission was organized to settle the question, and after months of wrangling, Senators, Congressmen, and judges of the Supreme Court rendered a decision which placed in the Presidential chair a man who had been fairly and honestly defeated for that high office. The debates before the Commission were acrimonious, and the ultimate decision of that packed body is a lasting blot upon our national escutcheon. The Republicans were in full control of every branch of the Government, the Treasury, the Army and the Navy. Rather than plunge the country into another Civil war the Democratic party acquiesced in the decision (whether wisely or not, different opinions prevailed), and Rutherford B. Hayes was duly inaugurated President of the United States. The Republicans then began to question the patriotism of those who denounced the fairness of the decision and we Democrats were told, in effect, that we had been again caught in a cunningly devised trap. Jere Black, the sound lawyer, upright judge and brilliant essayist, voiced the sentiments of millions of voters in one of his speeches before the Commission when he said to the majority of the Commission that its decision was corrupt and prearranged. These extracts from his speech delivered on that occasion have not lost interest through the flight of years:

"But perhaps I, more than most others, have felt the consciousness that I have lost the dignity of an American citizen. I, in common with the rest, am degraded and humiliated. This nation has got her great big foot in a trap. It is vain to struggle for her extrication. I am so fallen from the proud estate of a free citizen, you have so abjected me, that I am fit for nothing on earth but to represent the poor, defrauded, broken-hearted Democracy. And because I suffer more, they think me more good for nothing than the rest, and conclude to send me out on this forlorn hope, judging, no doubt truly, that it matters not what becomes of me. I ought to go gladly if anything which I can do or say might have the effect of mitigating the horrible calamity with which the country is threatened; a President deriving his title from a shameless swindle, not merely a fraud detected and exposed. I know not how I would feel if called upon to suffer death for my country. I am not the stuff that martyrs are made of, but if my life could redeem this nation from the infamy with which she is clothed, I ought to go to the grave as freely as I ever went to my bed. I see, however, no practical good that I can do, and it is mere weakness to complain. * * *

"At present you have us down and under your feet. Never had you a better right to rejoice. Well may you say: 'We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement'; 'when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us; for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves.' But nevertheless, wait a little while. The waters of truth will rise gradually, and slowly but surely, and then look out for the overflowing scourge. 'The refuge of lies shall be swept away, and the hiding-place of falsehood shall be uncovered.' This mighty and puissant nation will yet rouse herself up like a strong man after sleep, and shake her invincible locks in a fashion you little think of now. Wait: retribution will come in due time. Justice travels with a leaden heel, but strikes with an iron hand. God's mill grinds slow, but dreadfully fine. Wait till the flood-gate is lifted, and a full head of water comes rushing on. Wait and you will see fine grinding then."

Since the fraud of 1876, the infamous 8 to 7 decision, there has been no device the Republicans would not resort to in order to continue themselves in office. Zach Chandler was not a lawyer, but he was a keen, unscrupulous machine politician. He alone is responsible for the Presidential theft. Conkling, and even Hayes himself, it is said, conceded the election of Tilden, and were willing that he should be peaceably inaugurated. But Chandler would not have it so; he claimed fraud, without a scintilla of proof, and intended to and did manufacture the evidence to sustain his fraudulent purpose, when the proper time arrived. The result was the organization of the Electoral Commission, and Mr. Chandler and his criminal confederates, closely allied by the cohesive force of public plunder, were on hand with their perjured witnesses, to make good their false claim, which had been conceived in fraud and carried on in iniquity. The infamous decision was rendered, the two houses of Congress met, the decision was given the approval of the representatives of the people, and Rutherford B. Hayes feloniously given the great office of President of the United States. Previous bargains were probably faithfully carried out. Key of Tennessee was appointed Postmaster-General; many of the iniquities practiced during the reconstruction period were modified or abolished, and the people of the poor, downtrodden South breathed a sigh of relief and were thankful for the favors extended them by the political freebooters who had robbed them of their sacred political rights. Occasionally some Democrat in one of the Houses of Congress would refer, in fitting terms, to the larceny of the the Presidential office, but such utterances were promptly denounced by the Republican press as an impeachment of the honesty and integrity of the Supreme Court, just as Democrats were denounced for putting a plank in the platform of 1896, favoring an income tax. Patriots throughout the land know that Tilden was defrauded of the Presidential office. To condone or justify this act is to encourage its repetition. When such political methods are approved by the people of this country popular government will cease to exist.

In the coming campaign the Democrats should make a determined, aggressive campaign. A real Democratic platform should be adopted, and Democrats only have the selection of candidates. Democratic principles ought to be acceptable to all citizens who are opposed to Republican methods, but the party of Jefferson, Monroe and Jackson should not become the tail to the kite of every ephemeral organization which springs up like mushrooms in a night, and withers and dies in the heat of one campaign. When democratic ideas cease to prevail, imperialism is the only substitute, and this seems to be the object of Republicans at this very moment. King Teddy I would suit Republican leaders today, as well as President Roosevelt. Cæsar, Napoleon, in fact all the great characters of history, who have made themselves kings, emperors or dictators, began by cajoling and flattering the people—obtaining public confidence only to betray it.

A JEFFERSONIAN DEMOCRAT.

The Saunterer

Hofmeyr and His Past

Dr. Adrian Hofmeyr, late of South Africa, has been cutting a very wide swath in local social circles for several weeks. He has been lionized with San Francisco's accustomed impetuosity and fervor, and naturally there has been some curiosity as to his past, for some people have wondered that they had never heard of the distinguished individual before. He has been the guest of honor of exclusive club functions, he has been wined by Bohemians and dined by Channings, and altogether he has been having a very pleasant time. Dr. Hofmeyr, or the "Rev." Adrian Hofmeyr as he is sometimes designated, is a man of wondrously pleasing personality. He comes from an old Boer family, the members of which have been very prominent for more than a century in South African pulpits and politics, finance and education. His father was for years a professor in the Stellenbosch College near Cape Town, and when quite young Adrian achieved a great reputation as an orator. He is a man with a very picturesque past, most of which is familiar to residents of South Africa, and as his sympathies and services were given to the British in the recent struggle for independence he is cordially disliked by the Boers. So intense is their bitterness that they have taken the trouble to communicate with people in this city to warn them against the gentleman who has been so ardently lionized.

His Career in South Africa

Local representatives of Boer families say that years ago Hofmeyr was employed by Cecil Rhodes as a secret agent to mold Dutch opinion to Rhodesian methods. In this city he has posed as a Boer convert to English justice and forbearance, and his lectures have been eloquent eulogies on the life, character and ambitions of his late employer, coupled with expressions of profound regret for the unreasonable stubbornness of his misguided compatriots. It has been remarked that the "Rev." Adrian Hofmeyr has never delivered a single lecture under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., and it is more than probable that a letter which reached the hands of Secretary McCoy in January last is explanatory of the failure of that organization to invite the distinguished foreigner to avail himself of its prestige. According to the writer of the letter Hofmeyr no longer had any title to the reverendship because he was deposed by the church in South Africa where he had been a little too gay. The writer also recited that he was in Rhodes's pay when he was captured as a spy by the Boers. The author of the letter was T. N. de Villiers, a millionaire attorney of Pretoria who recently toured this country with his wife. He is one of the most prominent Boers in South Africa and he is also a devout member of the Dutch Reformed Church. During the late war he was held as a prisoner by the British, and used as a hostage on armored supply trains to insure their immunity from assaults by the Burghers.

Other Peppery Attacks

The letter from De Villiers was not the only one concerning Hofmeyr received in this city. He has been the object of epistolary attacks from people who were devoted to the Boer cause and who believed that he played a despicable part in the war. One letter came all the way from Schoennigen, Holland. It contained this paragraph: "Dr. Hofmeyr does not seem to be in a hurry to go back to his native land and relatives. I would not be surprised if he settled in America altogether as he is not known there as well as in South Africa." Hofmeyr has also been attacked by Captain Ollie Henry, a native son who fought with the Boers and who recently returned to California. He has been lecturing too, and has frequently denounced Hofmeyr from the platform as a spy and a traitor. But whatever may be said of the Dutch visitor he is technically neither a spy nor a traitor. Though a Boer by blood he is a British subject by birth. That fact is responsible for his presence in California, for when he was captured by the Burghers and threatened with death he lost no time in presenting the plea. It was received and recognized and before the war ended he was released.

Some Dinner Contretemps

Some funny things happened at the Bohemian Club dinner on Tuesday night. The dinner was the aftermath of the jinks and it was an oddly mixed-up affair due to the fact that William Greer Harrison brought in a number of war-horses from some G. A. R. banquet which he had been attending. The war-horses neighed and stamped all through the evening and quite threw the dinner out of joint. Instead of a jinks aftermath, the affair became a G. A. R. prelude and there were war stories and reminiscences all through it. General Miles took his hearers all 'round the world, depositing them at home finally, to their great relief; a certain gentleman from Connecticut discussed the advantages of Californian wines versus wooden nutmegs; and when Uncle George was assisted to his feet and began his speech it was late and a horn sounded outside. "What is that?" asked Uncle George.

"Gabriel's trump," answered a member.

"Then it's time for me to stop," said Uncle George, who does not always know his lines but who always knows when to stop. Even Joe Redding was off his feed, for he made a number of terrible puns—the like of which were never heard before in Bohemia. Finally, the dinner got back on the track and Neely O'Sullivan sang the "Star Spangled Banner" with great effect and, for an encore, "The Wearing of the Green," with even greater effect. After that Dr. Hofmeyr gave a truly thrilling word picture of the discovery of King Solomon's Mines in Rhodesia.

Oxnard Inquired as to the Cost

Speculation has been rife in political circles for some weeks concerning the probable candidacy of Henry T. Oxnard, the wealthy sugar magnate, for a seat in the United States Senate. When George Hatton, the gifted trainer, who groomed Senator Perkins for the Senatorial Derby, went South a few weeks ago, the rumor spread that he had been engaged by millionaire Oxnard to guide the latter over the hurdles in the next toga tournament. When Hatton returned I questioned him about the rumor, and he assured me that he had received no retainer from Oxnard and had not even been consulted about the next Senatorial contest. He said that he had been enjoying a vacation in the southern part of the State, and had not talked to a single politician about national politics. However there is no doubt that Mr. Oxnard would like to succeed Senator Bard. From an authoritative source I have learned that he has been consulting prominent politicans about the prospect of his achieving success in the event of his becoming a candidate. He was especially desirous of knowing what it would cost to make the fight. He was told that as he was a carpet-bagger, and as there would be great opposition, the seat would probably cost him more than one hundred thousand dollars, and he said he would not spend so much money for the honor. Yet there are many people who believe that he would, and consequently the politicians are anxious for him to enter the race.

The Hope of the Grafters

The legislative grafters are very eager for a lively Senatorial contest, and they would like to see a three-cornered battle with Oxnard, Bard and Grant striving for the toga. The financial market has been very dull during recent sessions in Sacramento, and Colonel Mazuma has been of a shrinking nature. Bargain counter prices have been the rule. George Hatton managed the Perkins campaign on an economical basis, and the grafters are looking for a little spirited competition such as stimulated circulation of the coin of the realm in the days of Stanford and George Hearst. They hope to see Mr. Grant of San Diego try again. He was badly gold-bricked a few years ago and it was humiliating to him to have his methods exposed, for as a consequence of the mismanagement of his campaign he was presented to the public in a very unenviable light. However he proved himself "a game sport" and won many friends by his candor and his sincerity. It was the opinion of many that his resemblance to his father was not confined to his physiognomy. He exhibited many traits that raised him in the esteem of the politicians of the State. With a good manager he would be able to give millionaire Oxnard a run for his money. The latter is said to have the support of the President, but Roosevelt would hardly care to be caught meddling in a Senatorial contest. That is rather dangerous business for a President to engage in.

What Pillsbury Wants

There is a possibility of a large sum of money being spent in this city in a contest over the assessorship. Some of San Francisco's most highly respectable citizens, gentlemen noted for their commercial integrity, for their interest in good government and for their aversion for practical politics, are desirous of a change in the Assessor's office. Dr. Dodge does not discriminate enough to suit them. He has assessed their property at too high a figure. Some of the big corporations are convinced that Dodge knows more about medicine than he does about property valuations. He is not sufficiently conservative. Hence they would like to beat him. E. S. Pillsbury, the attorney who represents more corporations than any other lawyer in town, is convinced that it is possible to beat Dodge, and I have heard that he has expressed a willingness to defray all the expenses of the Republican candidate providing he be permitted to name the man. In other words that paragon of civic virtue, Mr. E. S. Pillsbury, would like to be San Francisco's Assessor by proxy. What a model officer he would be! The Republican managers would like to nominate "Honest John" Lackmann for the job, but that gentleman says he prefers something easy.

Fisk May Be Forced

According to the political newsgatherers of the dailies the Republican leaders are worrying themselves into nervous prostration over the task of selecting a nominee for Mayor. I am of the opinion that they have found their man and that the convention will force him to take the nomination. Arthur Fisk, the Speaker of the Assembly, is the man. Fisk does not want the nomination because he would rather go to Congress than be Mayor. He long since outlined his plans for the future, and they contemplate a legislative career, for which he believes himself to be fitted by reason of the fact that he is an attorney. He served two terms in the State Legislature, and each time he made a brilliant record, and now his ambition is to occupy a seat in Congress. But according to political ethics the Republican party has claims on his services for past favors, and if the municipal convention should decree that he must run for Mayor, he cannot refuse. If such should be the decree Fisk would be in a very happy position, for he would be comparatively exempt from dictation. If nominated he would undoubtedly arouse a great deal of enthusiasm, for he is an ideal man for Mayor. So far in his political career he has inspired the highest confidence in himself, and yet he has never posed as a purist or a reformer. As Speaker of the Assembly he was accessible to everybody who had business before that body, and even his enemies conceded that he was always conscientious in the discharge of his duties. He had the courage to espouse measures that demagogues would be afraid to support even though they knew them to be right, and yet nobody ever impugned his motives.

The Mayor and the Sour Grapes

However Mr. Fisk may prevail upon the Republican leaders to refrain from forcing him to accept the nomination. There is one man he will have no difficulty in persuading. I refer to Mr. Abe Ruef who would much prefer a more pliable Mayor than Fisk. He had hoped to secure the nomination for his protege, Mr. Schmitz, but last Tuesday night he counted noses and found that he could not control a sufficient number of delegates. He informed Schmitz, and together they planned a grand-stand play. It was a letter addressed to the delegates to the Republican convention informing them that he (Schmitz) would not accept the Republican nomination. He would accept an indorsement but only upon condition that the convention would endorse the Union Labor Party platform. In that way did Mr. Schmitz testify his allegiance to the Union Labor Party cause after he had learned that the Republican nomination was beyond his power.

End of Dazzling Career

Gay Madame Barrios, widow of the indefatigable Guatemalan patriot for presidential purposes only, is said to have come to the end of her ten million dollars, her gayety, her beauty and her theatrical ambition in New York. The police handled the episode so quietly that only a meagre paragraph in the daily prints chronicled one of the last dramatic incidents in a life filled with melodramatic situations. When a girl in New Orleans a gypsy fortune-teller prophesied some of the Monte Christo events that were to besprinkle her life and all her friends gathered about the campfire laughed at the prediction, but the fanciful gypsy might have romanced ten-fold more without rivaling the story of the lively girl's subsequent career. Soon afterwards Barrios ran across her in New Orleans, became madly smitten with her charms, married her and took her to Guatemala, where he soon surpassed the records of all the Presidents of the Central American republics by the splendor and magnificence in which he ruled the country. Madame Barrios lived a royal life in that country. In one of the turns of fortune in which Barrios almost lost his head, the revolutionists were on the point of killing Madame Barrios, when Minister Mizner, father of the Mizner boys, stepped in and saved her life.

The Other Story of the Famous Jewels

When Barrios fell she escaped with a load of gold and came to this city to live. I remember her very well, living quietly in a handsome residence in Webster street. She had turned thirty then, was still a very pronounced blonde, thanks to the dermatologists, and had lost those finer shades of beauty that distinguished her as a girl. With her was her private secretary, a handsome, dashing fellow some ten years her junior. Apparently he looked after everything, managed the cash and the household and took all the care and responsibility off her hands so that she could have the perfect rest and quiet she required. It was he who cleverly managed the landing in this country of the famous Barrios diamonds. Everybody knew they were coming and all the jewel mongers wanted to get a peep at them. But, lo and behold, when the awaiting custom house officers came to examine the jewels with a view to collecting duty on them, everybody was amazed to learn that the bulk of the apparently valuable collection was paste. The doleful widow paid the small duty with a long face and that apparently ended the story, but not the story that was quietly circulated thereafter, that while all eyes were concentrated on the paste jewls coming in open and above board, the real gems were quietly smuggled in through an underground route—a method the astute Guatemalans had learned.

End of the Barrios Loot

Madame Barrios left here for the East fired with a burning ambition to win success on the stage. Her youthful secretary accompanied her. How much money they had no one knows, but it was all that was left of the loot gathered by Barrios, besides her jewels and personal effects. While here her household expenses easily topped one thousand dollars a month and that was at a time when she was supposed to be in mourning and not adding to the enrichment of shopkeepers. After she reached New York, however, she gradually yielded to her old love of splendid surroundings and the glamour of gay scenes and from time to time stories reached here that showed the loot bags of Barrios were being upturned. Now comes the story of the episode in New York, from which it appears that the once rich widow is now in financial straits.

That Historical Durbar

My compliments to Mr. J. Hamilton Gilmour of the Evening Post of San Francisco, and formerly of Her Majesty's service in India. To him I earnestly recommend an abiding faith in that familiar aphorism, "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." Mr. Gilmour is one of the brightest journalists in town, and he is a good fellow, too, but he is impetuous and sometimes he goes off half-cocked. But he isn't to blame for that—it's his British blood. Last week I published an anecdote about George Titheradge of the Henry Miller company, reciting that when he was an actor in India many years ago, he was appointed a herald by Viceroy Lytton to read the proclamation of the bestowal of the title of Empress of India upon Queen Victoria. At that time Mr. Gilmour, who is now an editorial writer on the Post, was a prominent resident of Delhi, where the proclamation was read by a British officer. Mr. Gilmour attended that historical durbar, and he has always been proud of the fact. But he did not know that the Viceroy held another durbar at Calcutta, which is a more important city than Delhi though it was not the capital of the ancient empire. Being a stickler for accuracy in historical matters, especially when they concern his native India, he grew violently indignant last Saturday, when he perused his Town Talk and read the story about Titheradge. He resolved on the spot to impress a presumptuous American journalist with the virtue of accuracy. The result was a ponderous editorial paragraph in the Post that savored of the pomposity of a leader in the London Times. Mr. Gilmour denied that Mr. Titheradge had read that proclamation at the direction of the Viceroy. He asserted that it was read at Delhi and he published the name of the army officer who did the reading. He characterized the story about the actor as purely imaginative. Now the fact is that there were two durbars held by the Viceroy for the purpose of having that proclamation read. One was held at Delhi and the other at Calcutta. Mr. Titheradge officiated at Calcutta. Having vouchsafed Mr. Gilmour this bit of historical information I hope that hereafter he will be good. When you read it in Town Talk it is true.

Root Discovered Teddy

When Secretary Elihu Root's resignation from the Cabinet became public this week, it was discussed in one or two papers in a manner indicating the belief that the Secretary of War, who was appointed to office by President McKinley, had never been very friendly with President Roosevelt. The fact is, their personal relations were most intimate and cordial. Their friendship dates back for years. As far back as 1881, when Mr. Root was a rising member of the New York bar, he befriended and supported Roosevelt in the latter's campaign for the office of representative in the Legislature of a New York district. Root discovered Roosevelt, and it was his influence that sent Teddy to the Republican National Convention of 1884, as a delegate. Some years later Mr. Root induced Mayor Strong to place Theodore Roosevelt at the head of the Police Commission. It was Mr. Root who nominated Roosevelt for Governor of New York in 1898, and it was this same gentleman who was responsible for Roosevelt's acceptance of the Vice-Presidential nomination at Philadelphia in 1900. The McKinley forces led by Mark Hanna were anxious to give second place on the ticket to Mr. Root, but the latter knew that the overwhelming sentiment of the convention was in favor of Roosevelt. So he made a hasty trip to Washington and convinced McKinley that it would be bad politics to side-track Roosevelt. As a result of this historical interview Roosevelt was nominated by acclamation. I have been informed by a man in touch with national politics that Roosevelt has more confidence in Root's judgment than in that of any other man in Washington. Root has long wished to resume the practice of law and would have resigned from the Cabinet in January, 1902, had it not been for the assassination of McKinley. He remained longer on account of his friendship for Roosevelt.

Peter Made Them Gasp

Peter Martin is surely "doing the grand" at Newport. When he married Miss Oelrichs the gossips of Newport said that she had not made a great match because he was not rich; that his mother held the purse-strings and that she had a pretty tight grip; also that she didn't have more than a few millions, a mere bagatelle according to Newport standards. But Peter is splurging just as though he were intent on proving those rumors false, and the Martin shekels are going at a much faster rate than they ever went in San Francisco. I saw a letter the other day, from a Californian who attended the entertainment given by the Martins at the Casino to mark the first anniversary of their wedding. "It was one of the swellest affairs of the season," says the writer, "and must have cost quite a pile of rocks. It made some of the swagger set gasp, for they didn't think Peter could do it. The scene of the entertainment was the lawn and the palm room, and the guests numbered nearly one hundred. Peter and Lily received their guests in a large tent on the tennis court. It was a Japanese affair. The tent was furnished with rugs and bamboo furniture and plants, and was lighted with electric bulbs. Later on the guests were escorted to the palm room where the dinner was served. There the Japanese decorations were on a most elaborate scale. The table was in the form of a Japanese pagoda, the poles of which were covered with lotus flowers and tiny electric bulbs. Japanese asparagus vines hung from the ceiling, and the walls were hung with Turkey red on which were Japanese silk panels. In the corners of the room were large bay trees studded with electric lights covered with yellow silk, giving the appearance of an orange tree in full fruit. A large Japanese parasol hung over the table, and the centrepiece of the table was of aquatic flowers. The menu cards were of Japanese wood paper and on them was the monogram of Mr. and Mrs. Martin in Japanese letters. It was a gorgeous affair. I hear that the decorations were designed by a young artist who was recently introduced in Newport by Harry Lehr, and who is quite the rage. I hear that Peter is anxious for his wife to accompany him to the coast, but that she says she is not anxious to make the trip. She has been told that she would be dreadfully bored."

He's the Object of Envy

The best evidence of the fact that Peter Martin is eclipsing the splendor of the ostentatious displays of the seasoned swells of Newport is that he has excited the envy of the aristocratic colony. An expression of this envy is to be found in the columns of a New York weekly in which the doings of the plutocrats are exploited, and which are devoted to the booming of the lime-light lovers of the 400. A recent issue contained this smash at Peter and his dinner:

For turbulent vulgar ostentation, the Peter Martin dinner at the Casino on Sunday night eclipsed any entertainment that Newport has seen in years. The ninety guests were plucked from the cream of the colony, and the thousand plebeian townsfolk who looked on, open-mouthed and wide-eyed, were afforded a treat indeed. * * * Never was there a clearer case of side-show than this blatant exhibition of Sunday night. All the townsman or casual visitor had to do was to pay his admission fee, walk down across the horseshoe piazza and witness a real live member of the 400 receiving with mamma in the striped tent. As the theatre was utilized for a cloak-room it gave the hostess and her guests a first-class opportunity to flit to and from the grill rooms and the multitude a chance to admire the finest feathers on the finest birds known to the natural history of a watering place. The whole thing could be analyzed without microscopic inspection. If the initial large function of the Peter Martins is a criterion of what is to be expected in the future, then my predictions regarding Newport need not undergo a revision.

Robbed in a Polo Game

It is surely late in the day for anybody to raise a protest against vulgar ostentation at Newport. Newport has become the synonym of vulgarity and ostentation and worse in this country. Newport is the parade ground of the spectacular rich. Its summer colony is composed of diamond-bedecked bounders of both sexes. For years they have been vieing with one another in the matter of extravagant display. They measure the success of a social function, whether it be an Astor ball or a Vanderbilt marriage, by the cost of the decorations. And because Peter Martin, an interloper from San Francisco, undertook to "hold his end up" after the conventional Newport style, he is censured for his "vulgar ostentation." The criticism is absurd. He chose a spacious lawn for his guests to flaunt themselves on to the amazement of the common herd, because he wished to cater to the cravings of the notoriety seekers of the social push. He knew that it pleased them to dazzle the townsfolk, and it was his breezy Western frankness that prompted him to make his private function a public show. If it had not been a great success it would not have aroused any envy. The Eastern snobs are no doubt sore over Peter's quick climb into the holy of holies, and they are annoying him. In that same New York weekly it was stated that Peter had been frozen out of a polo game one day, and that on another occasion when he made a clean, well-played goal, it was not allowed because the other side swore to a man that the ball did not roll between the posts. It was Mr. Martin's first goal of the season and some person said it was the first goal Peter ever made. No wonder Peter is anxious to return to San Francisco.

Newport. He ridicules the idea that the numerous divorces and piquant performances of the fashionables are symptoms of social decay. He contends that so far from falling into decay Newport society has been continually freshened with new vigor. It has not kept up a feeble existence by the process of breeding in and in, but its vitality has been invigorated steadily by taking in fresh blood until now it is thoroughly transformed. He argues that it is not an aristocratic society in any sense, but is distinctively democratic. It is not decadent but is very much alive. There is no doubt that Newport society is continually having new blood infused into it. In that respect it resembles the so-called ton of every fashionable centre. The chief figures in Newport's swim, like those of San Francisco's smart set, were seemingly social impossibilities a generation ago. But while the ambition to get up in the world has given a peculiar vitality to American society, it has not improved its morals or its manners. If the new blood infused into it were good blood, it would not be decadent. The climbers keep American society from stagnating but they do not improve its moral tone. They have, as a rule, nothing but their wealth to justify their ambitious vaulting. They are not inspired by high ideals and their only purpose in life is to add to the gayety of a society usually commonplace, and of a compass so small that the members soon grow weary of the sight of one another. To vary the monotony they are impelled to invent new forms of dissipation, and to indulge in inane amusements that enfeeble the mind and lead to all sorts of excesses. It is not aristocratic and neither is it democratic, for it is accessible only to those who can afford to contribute to its amusement. It is essentially plutocratic, and it is exacting only in its demand that whoever would be of it must be a factor in the promotion of its gayety. It has the distinctly plutocratic conscience that is rarely inflammable but that usually smolders like punk.

Can't Depose Him

Ned is still Czar of Society. Other leaders have come, tried to conquer—and gone off with their colors drooping. Many's the time attempts have been made to oust Greenway from his post of social arbitre, but in vain. Ned stays on top. And he doesn't want to stay—dear no! He's grown so plump that anything but an easy-chair at the club and iced drinks means hard work. "If they would only leave me in peace," sighs Czar Greenway. But they will not; indeed, they cannot, for there is not another man in society here who could fill the place of social leader as Edward M. Greenway does it. He has been "in" so long that he knows how to steer clear of all shoals of discord. He knows how to weld opposing elements and keep everybody smiling and in harmony. He can weed out a cotillion list without hurting feelings. He can manage a cotillion from start to finish so there'll be not the ghost of a hitch in its mechanism. Mr. Greenway, therefore, will retain his job as McAllister II just as long as he wishes to tolerate the bother of it. He has already arranged his list for the season's Friday Nights, and Native Sons' hall has been engaged for the dances. The debutantes are not all figured out yet but there will be some beauties and some heiresses in the list. Mrs. Salisbury will have her Fortnightlies and La Jeunesse will be reorganized, but the personnel of Mr. Greenway's Friday Night Club will remain substantially the same as last year.

The Webster Romance

The death of Fred Webster the other day occasioned no surprise among his club friends. He had been a physical wreck for several years, and all his friends knew that he was making rapid strides toward the grave. Webster was a typical man of the world, and though he was in the wool brokerage business, he devoted more time to the pleasures of life than to the cares of commerce. At the Pacific-Union Club he was noted for his ability as a poker player, and in his time he has won a great deal of money from the millionaire members of that club. He was sufficiently skilled at cards to have made a living at the great American pastime. One of his biggest winnings was in a game in which Billy Bourn was a heavy loser. It was reported at the time that Webster won eighteen thousand dollars. The game was started in the Pacific-Union Club but at midnight the players adjourned to a lodging house where they continued to woo the fickle goddess until late the following afternoon. Mr. Bourn has been a very conservative business man ever since.

The Stetson Tragedy

For many years Fred Webster was the central figure in a romance that was the talk of clubdom. The tabbies took a great interest in the affair. They said that he was very much in love with Miss Jennie Blair but that he had involved himself in complications of an amatory character that deterred him from marrying her. The supposition was that they were engaged for a long time. Some years ago when Al. Stetson committed suicide society obtained a glimpse behind the curtain of the Webster romance. There was a woman involved in that tragedy to whom Webster had been devoted for many years. The sensational revelations made at that time afforded the gay broker a capital pretext to break off the relationship, and after that every one thought he would persuade Jennie Blair to marry him. But the predictions of the prophets went wrong. Webster's marriage to another woman, a few months ago, was a great surprise to his friends.

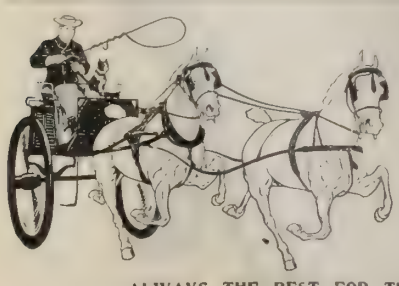
The Last Sad Rites

The funeral of Fred Webster took place last Monday from his Pine street residence, and the popular clubman was followed to his last resting place by men prominent in almost all the activities of life. Before the funeral a vast throng of people surged through the home of the deceased to take a farewell look at the familiar features. There were in that throng many white-haired matrons prominent in the society of long ago, and I saw also aged men who were once numbered among the gayest of gay brokers in the days when fortunes were won and lost in a few hours in Pine street, but who are now among the has-beens and who are seldom seen outside of the Pacific-Union Club. The personnel of that throng was significant of the high character of the associations that Fred Webster enjoyed. He was a man of many fine qualities, and men valued his friendship. One of the best-beloved companions of his later years was Herman Oelrichs, and the latter, loyal to the last, made all the arrangements for the funeral and conducted proceedings at the house.

The Prince Nearly Lost an Arm



Poor Prince Poniatowski is represented by a morning daily as having become thoroughly disgusted with the failure of numerous business ventures, in consequence of which he is said to have resolved to ship his lares and penates to Europe, there to spend the remainder of his days. It is true that Prince Poniatowski has suffered some financial reverses, but it is not in consequence of them that he is going to Europe. The fact is that the Prince is the victim of a very serious malady that has puzzled many local physicians. Some weeks ago he was operated upon in a local hospital, and it was thought probable, before the surgeons began their work, that it would be necessary to amputate an arm. Fortunately it was found that the scraping of the bone would suffice. The patient was under the influence of an anaesthetic for a long time, and it played havoc with his constitution. He is now a very weak man. Poniatowski conceived some brilliant financial schemes during the last few years, but he was unfortunate in the execution of them. The one that promised the most successful results was the Blue Lakes power venture, but it went wrong by reason of the blunders of the engineers who, I am told, were graduates of Stanford University and who were lacking in experience and ability. The Prince will go to Europe with over half a million dollars, and that will yield an income sufficient to enable him to live in luxury on the continent.

All the Little Parrotts were There

An interesting spectacle was presented at the San Mateo depot last Wednesday, on the occasion of the departure for the East of the Jack Parrotts. The Jack Parrotts, be it known, are among the few representatives of our rich families whose conduct during their harmonious domestic career has been such as to controvert the theories of the race-suicide alarmists. As compared with Jack Parrott, Teddy Roosevelt stacks up no higher than the proverbial three dimes. Ten olive branches in less than as many years is a record of which even a Roosevelt might well be proud. But as to the spectacle. Well, the Jack Parrotts started away last Wednesday with their eldest son John, whom they intend to enter at Georgetown University, and all the other little Parrotts—nine of them—journeyed down to the train to bid good-bye to mamma and papa and big brother. Isn't it easy to fancy that the spectacle was an interesting one?

An Exceptional Society Matron

The Mountford Wilsons and the Walter Martins are very fortunate this week for they are guests of Mr. and Mrs. Will Tevis at the beautiful Tevis home on the shore of Lake Tahoe. The hospitality of the Will Tevises approximates more closely that for which California was famous in the days before the Gringo came than any of which I have ever heard. Mrs. Tevis, who was Mabel Pacheco, has inherited many of the traits of her distinguished father, Governor Pacheco, and the most conspicuous of them is cordiality. Here is a womanly woman, by the way, who does not figure often in the social gossip of the bavardes of the daily press, but who, if she desired could easily become the leader of the 400. But she is too sensible a woman to bother about social triumphs. She is more concerned with the rearing of her four sons, for she is a model mother as well as wife. And yet she loves to entertain her friends who, naturally, are quite numerous. She is a big-hearted, charitable woman, and refreshingly free from the affectations that obsess the fashionable herd. She is animated by the compassion and sympathy for less fortunate mortals that mark the true gentlewoman. I recall an incident of a few seasons ago that showed her keen consideration for the comfort of others. A barber at the Tallac whom she had employed to cut her children's hair failed to put in his appearance one day. Mrs. Tevis visited him and found him in bed. She felt his pulse, told him he had a fever, and an hour later sent him a trained nurse who took care of him until he recovered.

A Case of Legal Wit

A bit of extremely happy repartee came out in court the other day. Brother Kelly of the African church was on trial for seduction. Attorney Sam Shortridge, in all his splendid dignity, looked after the colored brother's interests while ex-Judge Ferral did his best to convict him of the charge. During the course of his argument the prosecutor took occasion to remark that he believed money had been brought into the case for the use of the defendant. No sooner was this charge made than attorney Shortridge unwound himself, slowly arose in all his court dignity and, with nodding forefinger pointing straight at the speaker, rolled out in his most majestic tones: "It pains me greatly to interrupt the learned counsel for the prosecution at this critical stage in his exhaustive remarks, but I cannot refrain from correcting his last statement with the assertion that not only has no 'money been brought into the case for use of the defendant,' but no money has appeared in any way, shape or manner on our side. Indeed I may go so far as to state that as yet I have not received even anything in the shape of a fee." Ex-Judge Ferral apparently blanched at the last part of this statement. "Well," he said, after a short pause, "there must have been some reason for the counsel on the other side coming into the case, and as he was not inspired by a fee, the only one I can assign is the one set forth in a recent political campaign, namely, that under certain circumstances all gentlemen must stand together."

He Didn't Let Her Know

The Sargents gave a bull's head breakfast at their ranch near Monterey on Sunday and a number of Bohemian Club men were Charlie Dickman's guests for the end-of-the-week so as to take in the affair. Among them was a member of the Bohemian Club chorus who has not been long married. The tenor did not receive his invitation until Saturday and decided at once to accept it. He tried to get his wife by telephone but she was out. So he decided to go anyway and took the train for Monterey. From there he telephoned again. When he came out of the telephone room he had a very grave face. He wouldn't tell the other fellows what the message was but it was such a one as to have a quieting effect upon him for the rest of the day. The crowd returned Monday morning but the tenor came up on a Sunday afternoon train to make his peace.

The opening night of the new Lyric hall will have the importance of a society function. The twenty English players in "Everyman," the morality play, will make their San Francisco debut under the auspices of the Channing Auxiliary. Among those who have secured seats for the first night are the J. D. Spreckels's, W. H. Mills and family, Horace Davis, M. H. De Young, John F. Merrill, Sigmund Stern and J. Hyman.

The Subject of His Hallucination

The news of the sad plight of Ernest Hastings in New York aroused the sympathy of many of his friends in this city who esteemed him highly for his manly qualities. According to the despatches he was a victim of the hallucination that a California girl with whom he was in love was imprisoned in a Pullman car. The name given was "Madge" Cummings. In all probability the young woman to whom he referred is a Miss "Madge" Chapman with whom he became acquainted while he was a member of the Alcazar company. She is a daughter of the late Dr. Chapman who was physician of one of the China steamers, and who died suddenly a few years ago. Miss Chapman spent nearly all her life in Oregon, of which State her grandfather on her mother's side was at one time Governor. She is a tall, lithe blonde and a striking beauty, and is not more than twenty-one years of age. At the time she met Mr. Hastings she was imbued with histrionic aspirations, and he took great interest in her, for he believed she possessed talent and would be a success on the stage. He left town with a road company a few months ago, and played a season of several weeks in San Jose. About that time Miss Chapman, accompanied by her grandmother, took up her residence in San Jose, and she there began her stage career in the Hastings company, playing small parts. She contemplated going East soon, and I believe that Mr. Hastings intended to secure her an engagement in New York.

Brigham's Service to France

Dr. Brigham, whose death occurred several days ago, was chief surgeon in one of the French field hospitals during the Franco-Prussian war, and he was decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor. He was educated at Harvard and after graduating in medicine he went abroad for experience in European hospitals. His subordinates in the field hospital were jealous of him and hampered him in various ways, and one day he discovered that a patient who had been neglected was in a very weak condition. He picked the man up, held him out with one hand and then beat him on the back with a towel. The feat astonished the spectators but it had the desired effect; circulation was restored, and after that the French surgeons had more respect for their young American chief. The Brighams belong to the "old set" here, and it has always been their boast that they never attended a Greenway dance. There is a feud between the family and our Social Dictator. The Brighams are from Boston but they are related to the Duers of New York, the family to which Mrs. Clarence Mackay belongs. Kate Brigham's full name is Katherine Duer Brigham.

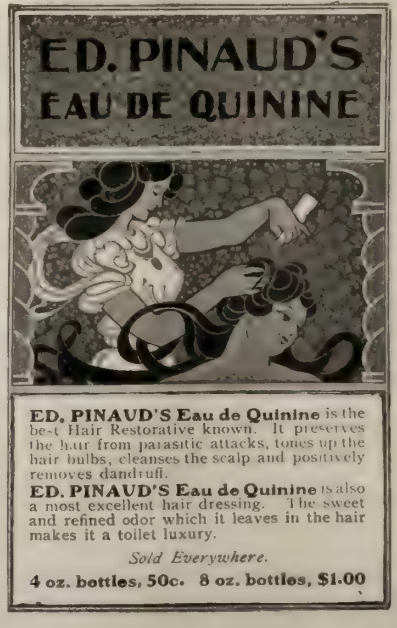
To Discourage Race Suicide

Though alienists assert and confidence operators demonstrate that "a fool is born every minute" the supply has hitherto exceeded the demand, especially in San Francisco. The community therefore has a right to resent the advent of a Denver scientist (?) who, while old Mother Earth is groaning under her foolish feat of fecundity, is encouraging her to stimulate her efforts, increase her ratio and cut her time schedule. Still, if this community were given a satisfactory guarantee that he would fulfill his promise to transport the threatened over-production to St. Louis and dispose of it there no valid cause of complaint could be found. In the school of social therapeutics which "Prof." Carroll has established in San Francisco it is taught that the "pain of the world" will be relieved by increased speed in delivery—an incontrovertible argument when applied to ball tossing, but open to doubt in the direction and management of this mundane fool factory. To stimulate natural desires "Prof." Carroll prescribes and promises a life of sybaritic ease and luxury unhampered by marital limitations. And this he styles "the Vrill System of Industry," and himself the "Enacting Trustee." "The Vrill System of Industry" seems to have been designed for the development, propagation and perpetuation of the particular species of fool that is attracted by the alluring prospects—and for the profit of the promoter, which is expected to increase in a corresponding ratio. The local experiment station (for development) is at 519 Van Ness avenue; the proving ground (for propagation) is to be located at the St. Louis Exposition. The fee for development is ten dollars; other fees are not stated.



His Wonderful System

It was the late General Barnes who said: "Some people are born fools; some people are made fools; some people are just d——d fools for lack of sense." "Prof." Carroll does not differentiate in the selection of material. His judgment is unerring; any one who pays the preliminary fee (invariably in advance) is deemed qualified beyond question. A course of ten lectures is considered sufficient to develop an ordinary specimen taken at random from the most common type, and fit him for picturesque follies upon the highest plane of idiocy. The pursuit of "the Vrill System of Industry," as outlined by the "Enacting Trustee," promises to be as interesting as Professor Loeb's experiment that resulted in the production of a hybrid crustacean by mating a starfish and a lobster. To begin with, "Prof." Carroll guarantees that every fool will find his mate, for the search will be facilitated and the species perpetuated by free love; and no one, man or woman, can be committed irrevocably to any mistake that may be made in the matter of selection. Absolutely no obstacle is placed in the way of fructification and multiplication. The doctrine of natural selection and evolution is a logical concomitant, and the production of the perfect fool under "the Vrill System of Industry" inevitable. To support this infant industry and satisfy the natural but secondary desires such as eating and sleeping, the "Enacting Trustee" announces that he has acquired a large tract of land at St. Louis, where a large city is to be built and inhabited solely by his subjects; and there the altruistic colony is to dwell forever more in co-operative harmony and promiscuous polygamy or polyandry.

He Has Many Followers

The general scheme of social government, as well as the details of co-operation, evidently have been borrowed from "Looking Backward," "Equality" and "The Coming Race." Physical labor is to be limited almost wholly to the necessary exertion of reproduction, for the "Enacting Trustee" is the discoverer of a remarkable force known as Vrill power—a combination of radium and electricity—which is warranted to do anything but make fools. All a colonist has to do, when not pursuing "the Vrill System of Industry," is to press a button and Vrill power does the rest. "Prof." Carroll, who evolved this conglomeration of free love, evolution, socialism, radium and electricity to confound the foolkiller, has found followers enough to convince any statesman that San Francisco has more than her just proportion of births to the minute. He has just completed the instruction of his third class of fifty—men, women and foolish virgins—and conferred upon them the "Recruit Degree." They are now prepared to enter upon the work that will fit them for the rank of Captains of Industry. All have been impressed with the absolute necessity of profound secrecy, and at the close of every lecture have been warned that "we want no notoriety." The "Enacting Trustee" is a tall, middle-aged blond with weak grey eyes and the phonographic delivery of a Divine healer. It has been suggested that he himself is "playing hookey from some foolish house," but the way in which the Vrill power and the Vrill System of Industry are producing coin for their exponent negatives the suggestion too emphatically. Still there are some who are inclined to question the soundness of "Prof." Carroll's financial judgment in restricting his field of operations by surrounding his social system with a barricade of secrecy. Possibly he had not studied the birth statistics of San Francisco sufficiently to learn that old Mother Earth recognizes no class or condition in the selection of a father for her "touched" progeny. There are many features in "the Vrill System of Industry" that would have appealed to the local 400 as eloquently as to the residents of the Western Addition who see Nob Hill and Pacific Heights only from a distance. Had "Prof." Carroll been taken up by San Francisco society his system might have become a popular fad. What a picturesque petticoat it would make to cover bedraggled lingerie!

Family Jars of Faculty Members

Domestic scandals are becoming quite common in the faculty of the University of California. The latest, that of Dr. R. A. McLean, is being exploited in the daily press with details sufficient to gratify the most exacting tabby, and the case of Professor Soule, who is trying to have an alimony order rescinded, has its interesting features. Less than a year ago we were regaled with the sight of Dr. Wallace Reading's family skeleton. His cruelty to his wife evoked the condemnation of a court of law. The title to a chair in the university is usually regarded as a credential of good morals and high character, and it would certainly seem that some other qualification than mere technical proficiency should be demanded of those selected to instruct the college youths.

Theodore Wores writes from Grenada that he is painting busily in the land of the Moors. He will return to New York in December.

Brown's Effeminated Feet

There is a man in San Francisco whose feet are so small that the smallest of men's shoes are too large for him. Instead of having his shoes made to order, he wears women's foot-gear. This unique individual is Mr. I. I. Brown, the attorney of the firm of Vogelsang & Brown. Not long ago he was on a Pullman bound for New York, and on the first night of the journey he put his shoes under his berth. When he awoke in the morning the shoes were missing, and he concluded that the colored porter had polished them and forgotten to return them. So he summoned the colored man and asked, "What did you do with my shoes?"

"Why, suh, I never seen yo' shoes," said the porter, and he looked surprised.

"I put them under the berth last night," said Brown, and then he described the missing property.

The porter opened his eyes in amazement.

"Fo' de Lawd s sake, were dose yo' shoes?"

"Yes, they are mine; what did you do with them?"

"Why, suh, I put dem shoes down under the berth of the lady you was talkin' to all yesterday afternoon," said the colored man with a merry twinkle in his eye.

And the attorney understood why the porter had blundered.

Lieutenant-Commander Carter

Poor, well meaning, but hapless little Fidelio S. Carter! He has again escaped by the skin of his teeth. While the pitiless court-martial decreed his dismissal, he has wriggled through by the aid if clemency in higher quarters, and banishment to the wilds of the Pensacola, Florida, naval station is all he will have to suffer at present. Carter's naval career has been anything but rosy. His brother officers are wont to say that there is no vernier with graduations small enough to measure Carter's knowledge of navigation. His talents lie in other directions. When he undertook to navigate the little Yantic to Chicago through the St. Lawrence and the canal, the people suspected that he was conducting a Coast Survey reconnoissance for submerged dangers. One of the funniest narratives I ever heard was Carter's own account of that voyage. He got there, though, which puzzled many people quite as much as how he "got there" in his successive advancements to the grade he now holds.

Ho! for the Green Fields

I am glad to learn that Rear-Admiral Kempff, the balance of whose useful life is to be spent upon the retired list of the Navy, is to make his home in the West, upon a large ranch that he has purchased. Hitherto Washington, D. C., has been the Mecca of the retired officer, but Admiral Kempff's example, from what I hear, is to be followed by others. It is a curious thing that the average sailor's ambition, his idea of bliss, when he has abandoned the sea, is to settle down in the country, to go farming, the very calling traditionally regarded as the diametric opposite of the seafaring life. To call a sailor in active service a "farmer" is the bitterest reproach. He may endure some of the deadliest invectives which would evoke bloodshed from the landsman, but tell him he is a "haymaker"—or, nearly as bad, a "soldier"—and you may look for trouble instanter.

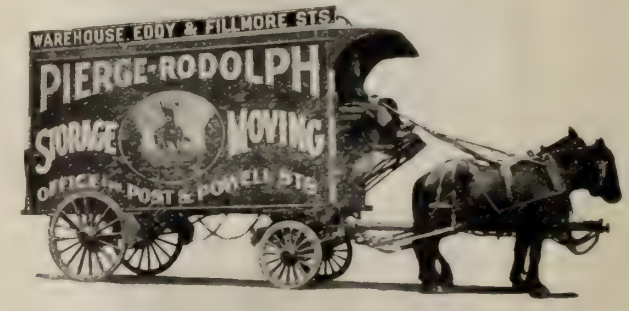
The Spectacular General

General Miles's excessive appetite for adulation was amusingly exhibited one day last week. Always yearning and generally looking for the plaudits of the multitude at every move, the General, as he left the Grand Army convention, in the Grand Opera House, looked around him in the eagerness of a lost child in search of its parent. He passed through the lobby of the theatre with his head twisting in every direction, to see if some one would recognize him. None did. There was no applause, not even a nod. Before entering the rig—an open one—that awaited him at the curb, the General paused fully two minutes on the sidewalk, looking up and down the street, this way and that, but still there was nothing doing. His eagerness to attract attention was as unmistakable as his disappointment at his failure. He was driven off in silence. Miles's vanity is probably his most conspicuous trait. During his extensive European tour some years ago, his time was principally spent in "witnessing" reviews, "inspecting" arsenals, and performing other perfunctory acts that afforded opportunities for homage and honors. The principal fruit of this tour was a new uniform for himself which he designed on his return. I am confident that Miles has been photographed more times, and in more attitudes, than any man, woman or child in our broad land. No theatrical star has his or her comings and goings and doings more loudly and widely heralded than those of Miles.

Movements in the Service



There have been so many changes at the Presidio of late it is not safe to bet on how long any officer will remain at that post. There is much regret felt and expressed at the approaching departure of the Seventh Infantry for the Philippines, the officers having done so much to make the Presidio a pleasant place to visit during the stay of the regiment at that post. In the meantime they and their friends are making an effort to soften the pangs of parting by arranging as many dances and other little gatherings as is possible to crowd into the intervening space. Brigadier General Robert M. O'Reiley, who is expected here in a few days on a trip of inspection, was very popular during his service here as chief surgeon of this department. Colonel C. Morris of the Artillery Corps has been ordered to the Presidio to take command of that post. Major J. V. White of the Artillery, who has been stationed at the Presidio for some time past, will sail for the Philippines by the transport leaving here October first, having been ordered there for duty in the Adjutant General's department. Colonel A. W. Vogdes, of the Artillery, well known in San Francisco during his long station at Alcatraz, has been ordered from San Diego, where he has been on duty the past year, to take command of the Artillery District at Key West, Florida. Major-General MacArthur, accompanied by Mrs. MacArthur, his son Lieutenant Douglas MacArthur of the Engineer Corps, and his aide, Captain Parker West, has gone on an inspection trip to San Diego.

Fred Gebhard Returned to the Turf

My New York correspondent writes me that "Freddie" Gebhard is evidently back on the turf to stay. Years ago, about the time Gebhard had his big crush on Lily Langtry, he was equally interested in horseflesh. His racing seemed a part of his social existence and Eole, St. Saviour and other fine mounts carried his cerise and gold spots. He used to give track dinners that were great affairs and to which invitations were at a premium. Then came that big Port Jervis wreck which almost completely destroyed the stallions and brood mares that Gebhard was shipping to his ranch in this State, near Middletown in Lake county. St. Saviour was one of the few to escape the wreck unscathed and Gebhard has retained the famous stallion ever since. Nothing could induce him to part with the horse, which has won him over sixty thousand dollars and which he loves aside from his stake merits. Haggin wanted to buy St. Saviour, which is now in Kentucky, but still owned by Fred Gebhard. The Californian ranch went on the market and it was thought its owner had left the turf forever. But he was not entirely out of it. Gay Boy has won him money but not with the blare of trumpets of the old days. He still buys horses and the other day he became the owner of Raglan, which immediately won the Spinaway stakes of eleven thousand dollars. Charlie Trevathan, who had an interview with Gebhard after his victory, says that for that one night he was "Freddie" again, "smiling, buoyant, enthusiastic, intense, sincere and, to his intimates, affectionate." But Fred Gebhard doesn't look a little bit like the man who was Langtry's lover. He is not so handsome, and he looks more like a quiet business man than a man of clubs.

Guy Lochinvar Barham's Quick Work

Guy Barham always was a romantic chap and therefore I am inclined to give credence to a story that comes from the East to the effect that his marriage with Miss Baby of Detroit was in the nature of an elopement. It may be somewhat difficult to fancy Guy Barham in the role of young Lochinvar coming out of the West, swooping down on a millionaire's mansion, and carrying off the pride of his heart, but that is just what is said to have happened. Miss Baby's family is one of the oldest in Detroit, and her father is very wealthy. The old gentleman had no particular objection to the personality of the Californian Bank Commissioner, but it appears that he had long ago destined his pretty young daughter for a wealthy old crony who lives in Canada. However Miss Marie had no intention of marrying old moneybags. She met the gay bohemian wit of Los Angeles and San Francisco down in the citrus belt last summer, and she promptly well in love with him, and when she announced their engagement her father was furious. He tried to persuade her to break it off, and it is said that after ordering an expensive trousseau she intimated that she would do so, but merely to placate papa so that he would not shy at the bill. Just as Detroit society was beginning to gossip over the breaking of the engagement, the gallant Barham appeared on the scene, married Miss Baby in a hurry and whisked her off on a honeymoon trip.

Ethyl's New Coat

Not since the late Mrs. Charles Fair sported her beautiful Russian sables here has anything so absolutely swell in wraps been seen in San Francisco as Ethyl Hager's new coat. The cost, I am told, was nine hundred dollars. It is a combination of Russian lace and sable, and is decidedly French in effect. It imparts, strange as it may seem, a decided piquancy to the plump and stalwart society girl. Miss Hager is not the most stylish girl in society, but she does not consider the cost of anything in wearing apparel that strikes her fancy. The Hager girls are the best spenders in our smart set.

The Rucker-Lion Feud

That ancient feud between the Ruckers and the Lions of San Jose has broken out afresh. The Ruckers and the Lions are among the most prominent citizens of the Garden City, and they have long been rivals in business. But their enmity has not been confined to commercial affairs. It has occasioned discord even in social and political circles, for both families have their sympathizers, and factional strife has been fomented in clubs, lodges and political conventions. The latest disturbance occurred in the board of directors of the Hotel Vendome, and the police had to be summoned to restore order. L. Lion, who is president of the Commercial and Savings Bank of San Jose, and his son Gus, who is vice-president of the same institution, are heavy shareholders in the hotel stock company, and the disturbance was said to have been occasioned by the fact that Gus was not elected a member of the board. Another version of the affair was that Joseph Rucker, who is president of the board, sold a bunch of treasury stock with the understanding that it was to command a dividend at the next meeting of the shareholders, and that he received a commission for disposing of the securities. When the meeting occurred there was trouble over the dividend, and then there ensued crimination and recrimination between Rucker and the Lions. However Rucker was re-elected and Gus Lion was dropped from the board of directors. The Vendome, by the way, has had two very successful seasons under the excellent management of George Snell, and the profits of the corporation have been large.

ERUPTION OF MT. VESUVIUS.

Once more Italy's big volcano is spouting lava and thousands of sight-seers are going to the vicinity to witness the spectacle. California has a volcanic peak that draws more visitors annually than ever go to Vesuvius. The Lick Observatory on the summit of Mt. Hamilton is as great an attraction as Italy's spouting volcano, but the work it does is upbuilding instead of destroying. This is the best time of the year to visit Mt. Hamilton, spending a few days at Hotel Vendome, San Jose, and enjoying its many attractions.

One of the most elegant imported gowns ever brought to this city is the marvelous creation in white, by Beer of Paris, which will be one of the features of next week's Opening Fall Exhibit at the Emporium. It is a combination of real Duchess and Irish point lace, with a perfect shower of over five hundred dainty white silk pon-pons in relief.

Everywoman

A Morality Play of the Twentieth Century.

Characters:

Everywoman, Miss Birdie Gaygirl, soprano star of the Burlesque.
Fellowship, the contralto of the same theatre.
Kindred, chorus girls.
Goods, the manager.
Good Deeds, a college boy studying for the ministry.
Beauty, a society girl of bohemian tendencies.
Strength, an athletic clubman in love with Everywoman.
Discretion, a married man who admires feminine stage stars.
Five Wits, clever men-about-town, an artist, a newspaper critic, a playwright, a musician and a lawyer.

Argument:

Everywoman has been several times summoned to the telephone. She attempts to study her role for the next burlesque, confers with her modiste, and entertains the Five Wits and other callers, and makes strenuous outcry every time the telephone rings. However, having learned from experience that it is better to answer the 'phone than to miss a possible good thing, she never fails to reply. She talks to her callers, etc., to this end:

Discretion (at the 'phone.)
Ho, Everywoman, will you come with me
Automobiling this afternoon beside the sea?

Everywoman.
Oh, dear, I can't today engage in any sport
For other duties call me. I really hadn't ought
To do a blessed thing.
But study.

Discretion.
But I have bought that ring,
An amethyst with diamonds. Such a pity—
And tomorrow for a month I leave the city.

Everywoman.
Ring up later and perhaps I can arrange
With my understudy. Certainly I need a change
From this dreadful moil of work;
And an outing I am never known to shirk.
(Hangs up receiver.)

Five Wits.
Say, Birdie, will you go with us to dinner?
We'll ask Beauty, too, that pretty little sinner.
For today each of us feels that he's a winner.

Everywoman.
Now please do not tempt me for I should hate to yield.
Take Miss Beauty—she's a flower of the field,
But for me, you know to work I'm firmly sealed.
(Phone rings.)

Everywoman.
Hello! Good Deeds? Good morrow, little boy!
To dinner? Oh, 'twould be a perfect joy.
But unfortunately I can't go today.
Just hard work for me and not a bit of play.
(Sighs.)
Rehearsal's waiting—must report at four.
Well, yes, then—Thursday—stage door.
(Hangs up receiver.)
Oh, goodness! When I chose a stage career
I little thought 'twould be so hard.
(To Modiste.)
My dear
I think this band should be a trifle smaller.
(To Callers.)
Now don't you think this gown makes me look taller?
You'd better go now, boys. I really must Go scan my role. Tomorrow night I trust
I'll make a dashing hit. You must come down
To clap me and (To Critic)
tell all the town.
Make Fellowship tear out her long black hair,
Poor thing! A pity that she is not fair.
Then you and I, with Kindred to help out,
Will sup after the show. Now please get out.
(Callers depart.)

Everywoman.
To be a popular star, one must abjure
The lessons of one's youth. To be all pure,
Modist, reserved. Instead, all things to all men
One must be; cajole one here, flatter one there,
Ah me!
(To Modiste)
I'm really in woful despair,
Not one line learned, tomorrow night the show—
That ring Discretion has! Oh, I must go
With him; new jewels count for so much.
Then Beauty, too, with her to keep in touch,
Be idolized by Society, please the Swells—
(Phone rings.)
Oh, dear, perdition take those horrid bells!
Hello, hello! Discretion? You, again?
(How persistent are these old married men!)
Yes, yes; well, make it Monday. I will go
But you must have me back in time for show.
I can't throw my career upon the breeze—
Ha, ha! Cap—windmills? Oh, you naughty tease!
(Hangs up receiver.)
Sometimes I wish I'd never sought the stage,
Or of Experience had turned the page.
I might have stayed at home with Mamma dear—
But that would have been such a bore, I fear.
(Phone rings.)
I shall not answer—yes, I guess I will,
Perhaps it indicates a change of bill.
And then I can forego this horrid part
And follow out the dictates of my heart.
Hello! Beg pardon, I did not catch name.
Strength—who loves me just the same?
In spite of our quarrel the other day
When we had lunch a deux across the bay?
No, no, I cannot go today. Today I work.
Whenever, Strength, did I a duty shirk
Even for you? You're coming right up now?
You will not take no for an answer? How Can you be sure that I will let you in?
Housebreaking you do not consider sin?
Well, come, then. (I adore a man of will.)
I'll send word, then, to Goods that I am ill,
And ask a day to rest in, shall I? Say?
And Fellowship can be the star today.
Ten minutes, dear, for I am not half dressed.
(Hangs up receiver.)
An hour ago I was horribly depressed,
But Love is sweet—and Strength's the dearest chap.
The others are not in it now; he's won the lap. —The Josher.

Love's Span

The fleecy clouds in the heavens high
Beneath the light of an opal sky
Showed tints of morn;
The blush that over the landscape lay
Spoke tender hopes for a glorious day,
When love was born.

The sun's caress woke the slumb'ring glade
And turned the light to a deeper shade
On brook and mound;
No sign betrayed in the glowing west
The storm-cloud trembling with dark unrest,
When love was crowned.

The world was hushed when the sun went down;
It left the sky 'neath its threat'ning frown
An angry red,
And hope went out with the dying light
As day gave place to a starless night—
When love was dead.

MABEL PORTER PITTS.

Our Jolly Sea Dogs

Scene: Market street, San Francisco.

Time: the morning of a street parade.

There is heard the blare of a military band. Close behind it marches a portly warrior resplendent in the gold braid of a Commander in the Navy. He is followed by a Lieutenant-Commander, several gorgeous chaps with the stripes of Lieutenants, and a covey of Ensigns. Many of this gay array display upon their manly breasts medals and badges enough for a Field Marshal of twenty campaigns. They are flanked and followed by a brilliant, be-chevroned petty staff. A full color-guard comes next.

Behind all this pomp and panoply of war walk six privates. Fourteen more brass-bound officers keep them in subjection. A full hospital corps brings up the rear with stretchers, bandages, and other first aids to those who may be overcome by the perils of the march.

Two bystanders look on attentively.

First Bystander: Say, my friend, what have we here?

Second Bystander: That's the California Naval Militia.

F. B.: Ah, commanded, no doubt, by that jolly sea-dog in front?

S. B.: Oh, no. That's only Commander Smooth-Bore. Doesn't know a turret from a time-azimuth.

F. B.: Why, how is that? I supposed the Naval Militia contained mariners.

S. B.: 'Od's bumpkins and belaying pins! No! Mariners are not wanted in the Naval Militia. They would spoil the whole thing. They would ruin the graft.

F. B.: But the head of it must be a sailor?

S. B.: Not at all. Captain Sterny is the head of it. He was that fellow you saw marching with the United States Veteran Navy, wearing a white cap when the uniform of the day was blue, and waving and bowing from the ranks to the populace on both sides of the street.

F. B.: Quite so. A seasoned veteran. In what battles?

S. B.: None.

F. B.: None? Why, what is he veteran of?

S. B.: Salutes and target practice.

F. B.: Yet he was with the Veteran Navy.

S. B.: Never in the United States service. The Veteran Navy wears regalia. Sterny sells regalia. See?"

A smooth-faced youth with a lieutenant's braid stalks by, arms swinging.

First Bystander: Quick, who is that?

Second Bystander: That? Why, that's Lieutenant Camera, the navigator.

F. B.: Ha, the man who navigates ships, the expert in compasses, chronometers, sextants and logarithms.

S. B.: Wrong again. Expert in trousers. He's a tailor.

F. B.: But he surely understands about dygograms, parameters, meridian altitudes and lunar distances?

S. B.: I doubt if he can spell them. He navigates shears, principally.

The stripes of a lieutenant-commander dazzle the onlookers. Solemnity marks their wearer's visage.

First Bystander: Look! there goes our Coroner, Dr. See-Land.

Second Bystander: He's never seen anything else. He's surgeon-in-chief to the Naval Militia, though.

F. B.: But a good surgeon?

S. B.: Undoubtedly. They showed great judgment when they made the Coroner Bull-Surgeon. A coroner will be needed when that outfit undertakes to run a ship.

F. B. And who may that sailorly-soldierly little Ensign be, who is showing the men how to haul on the drag?

S. B.: That's Ensign Holystone. He's the only man-o-war'sman in the whole bunch. He'll always be an Ensign, though.

F. B.: How so?

S. B.: Because he knows more about guns and ships than he does about dancing and pink teas.

F. B.: But I thought you said this was the Naval Militia?

S. B.: I did.

F. B.: It's intended as a reserve for the Navy in time of war, isn't it?

S. B.: By the tay-payers, yes. But its officers, no. They intend it to boom them in politics and business.

The First Bystander is wrapped in thought. Suddenly he inquires:

"Why doesn't the Navy Department, or the Adjutant-General look into this thing a bit?"

"Search me."

The band strikes up "A Life on the Ocean Wave." The California sons of the briny shift their quids, hitch their trousers, and stand full-and-by up the street.

Exeunt omnes... —The Jester.

Grace Golden, who died last week in the East, was a very strict Catholic. She always crossed herself before going on the stage and invariably prayed before each performance, following Mary Anderson's example. Grace Golden was born in the Hoosier State, her mother being Welsh and her father Irish. She was a popular comic opera prima donna and was with Pauline Hall, Lillian Russell and others before joining Savage's organization.

Automobile Topics

Interest in automobiling in this city is increasing every day and this fact is clearly evidenced by the number of the motor vehicles that are being sold. Still with the increase of the modern chariots there seems an increased opposition by the owners of horses, but there is no doubt that in time this prejudice against the auto, a useful conveyance in every sense of the word, will pass away. People will soon realize that automobiling is not a mere fad.

Matters among the horseless enthusiasts all over the State are booming and no less than three race meets are to take place this winter. The Fresno Automobile Club is full of enthusiasm regarding the tournament which will be given in Fresno about the first of October. The Southern Pacific will give excursion rates to all those attending the Fresno race and fully ten thousand people are expected to attend the event. Then following this tourney a race meet is to be held on the Ingleside race track in the city, and this event will no doubt arouse great interest. The local autoists will probably see Barney Oldfield and Henri Tournier in the races here. Secretary E. P. Brinegar of the California Automobile Club is in correspondence with Barney Oldfield, "and it seems more than likely," said Mr. Brinegar, "that he will be on the coast this winter to drive his eight-cylinder Winton racing car, the one that competed in the Gordon Bennett races in Ireland." After this event one will in all probability follow in Los Angeles. Charles Heineman, one of the big automobile dealers in Los Angeles, was in town the early part of the week and said that nearly all of the autoists in the southern part of the State were "very anxious to hold another meet in the citrus belt this winter. Many of our boys will probably be up for the tourney here and it is more than likely that C. H. Merritt of Pasadena, who now owns Foxhall Keene's forty-horse power Mercedes, the chariot that broke all the world's records last year, will be among them."

Things are booming with the automobilists across the bay and a new club has been organized in Alameda to be known as the "Ireland Automobile Club." The members of this organization held a very successful run to San Jose last week. It was four o'clock in the afternoon of a week ago today that the Ireland Auto Club enthusiasts left Alameda for San Jose, to which place they went by way of Alviso and Mountain View. San Jose was reached in good time and the members remained at the Hotel Vendome, where preparations had been made for them. On last Sunday morning the autoists toured to all the principal points around San Jose. The party left the Garden City at four p. m., journeying home by way of Niles and Mission San Jose. Among the members who participated were Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Hanley in a Knox machine, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Dana and Miss Hillyer also in a Knox, Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Dodge, W. E. De Barnardi and Eddie Dodge in their Toledo, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Smith in an Elmore and Mr. and Mrs. W. K. Scott and Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Spear in their Knox's. Mr. A. J. Samuel, accompanied by his wife, drove a Knox and acted as captain of the run.

"Old Pacific" has completed her transcontinental trip. This ends the Packard touring car expedition planned by Harold Larzelere of this city and manager of the Pacific Motor Car Company. "Old Pacific" is a Packard automobile that left this city on the ocean to ocean trip last June. Mr. E. T. Fetch and Mr. C. Kramp were the occupants of the auto. They left here on June twentieth and arrived in New York a week ago last Tuesday. Mr. Kramp, speaking of the trip when he reached Denver after the hardest part of the journey, said, "If this motor had been an airship we wouldn't have had a fall. The trip has been an uneventful one, but it has been instructive to the highest degree."

Local automobilists who are very much incensed against the Supervisors of Marin county are anxious to see what action the Supervisors will take against M. H. De Young. Mr. De Young is now the possessor of a Winton touring car and last week took the modern chariot to his home in San Rafael. Now it is very probable that Mr. De Young will want to take moonlight drives in his horseless carriage. But the automobile law in San Rafael says no automobile is allowed to run between the sunset of one day and the sunrise of another. The restriction is absurd.

Some of the recent purchasers of automobiles are J. Sheldon Potter, a young capitalist of this city, Mr. A. A. Moore, who bought a four-cylinder gasoline locomobile touring car, C. S. Middleton, who has purchased a Franklin four-cylinder machine, H. H. Taylor of Oakland a Toledo and Benjamin Taylor a four-cylinder Franklin, and Thomas H. B. Varney a Toledo touring car.

That automobile endurance contests heretofore held in this country have been little better than holiday parades, is evidenced by the seventeen perfect scores made on the New York-Boston run last fall. But the run to be held in October under the supervision of the National Association of Automobile Manufacturers will give the makers a chance to show the public what their cars are really capable of doing in the way of making long journeys over mountains and bad roads. This trip will in no sense be a race, but a good strong test of the durability of the cars. The route will be from New York to Kingston, over the Catskill mountains to Binghampton, Corning, Genessee, Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland and Pittsburg, making in all a distance of eight hundred and twenty-five miles.

STAGE

A Triumph for Davis

Though Richard Harding Davis is less addicted to the epigram habit than his British contemporary, Mr. George Bernard Shaw, he has nevertheless written a play far superior to "The Devil's Disciple." As playwrights both Mr. Shaw and Mr. Davis are in the tentative stage, for neither has succeeded in winning the confidence of managers to the extent of being assured of a production of anything that emanates from his pen. It is fortunate for the public that they have not, because meanwhile they will endeavor to do their best, and will refrain from turning out dramatic pot-boilers after the manner of Clyde Fitch. There are points of dissimilarity as well as resemblance between Mr. Shaw and Mr. Davis. The former poses as a mountebank. Mr. Davis has proved himself one. It was in the Spanish war, when the budding playwright was serving as a war correspondent, that he exhibited the traits of a faker. After the first conflict with the Spaniards he rushed up to the Associated Press correspondent and asked him to include his (Davis's) name among the newspaper men on the firing line. The fact was that he was in the rear and the Associated Press man told him that he did not intend to indulge in misrepresentation to gratify the vanity of anybody. Later on Davis enlisted the influence of Teddy Roosevelt in his behalf, and the future President asked the correspondent, from whose lips I received the story, that Davis be credited with having been on the firing line during the fighting. But even Teddy's influence was of no avail. The only newspaper correspondent who put Mr. Davis on the firing line was Mr. Davis himself. So if the inclination to play the mountebank is essential to play-building, it is evident that Mr. Shaw has no advantage over Mr. Davis. And though Mr. Davis is no hero to the Associated Press man who met him at El Caney, he has the ability to plan, plot and construct a comedy drama that is well worth the price of admission to the Columbia theatre. When you compare "The Taming of Helen" with "The Devil's Disciple" or with any of the Clyde Fitch dramatizations of social fads and foibles in Amelia Bingham's repertoire, it seems almost a wild and exhilarating success. It is a simple little comedy, with a simple little story for a motif, but it is peopled with human beings who arouse your interest in their ambitions and their struggles. Mr. Davis plays upon the audience as upon a gamut. He aims at effects a little too palpably, but he achieves them. There are no concessions made but the sense of reality in that last act is tremendous. And the beauty of it is its strong probability. The author takes you into the green room of a theatre where the hero playwright's life-work is receiving its initial production. It is a brilliant success. The house is crowded, and everybody is enthusiastic except the author, who believes he has lost the girl he loves. She is about to leave for America. The leading actress in the play, who is the devoted friend of both the author and his sweetheart, receives a note of farewell from the latter which contains an explanation of the misunderstanding between the lovers. The actress resolves to unite them, and without the knowledge of the stage manager or the playwright she starts for the steamer in a cab to intercept the girl. She has only fifteen minutes in which to accomplish the feat, and she is due at the end of that time to appear in the star situation of the play. The call-boy notifies the manager of her departure, and there is immediately consternation behind the scenes. The situation is tense. It is beautifully handled, and is not in the slightest degree improbable. Humor and pathos are daintily blended in the scene, and though you are certain that the leading lady will reappear in the nick of time you take a feverish interest in the proceedings, and by the time the climax is reached you are on the point of arising in your seat and shouting. Surely it is a triumph for the skill of an experimental playwright. It affords a thrill, and restrains the women in the audience from calling their hat-pins into requisition until the very moment the curtain begins to drop. Of course the play is not free from blemishes to solace the captious critic who resents perfection in anything, but "The Taming of Helen" is a refreshing comedy abounding in droll situations, told in sparkling dialogue and free from pulpit polemics and cafe æsthetics. Moreover it is a play that shows the company to much better advantage than they appeared last week. Mr. Morton Selten, for instance, proves himself a very droll comedian in the role of Reginald Herbert, and Miss Martha Waldron scores by her buoyant personality as Helen. Miss Anglin has not a great deal to do, but she appears in knickers and silk hose in the last act, and the impression is most agreeable. Mr. Miller is surprisingly juvenile in the role of the ardent lover, and he invests it with considerable breeziness.

The whiskey of the particular—Chapin & Gore.

One scene in "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," which will be Florence Roberts's opening bill, shows a May-day party in Central Park, the stage crowded with children. "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" will be given at the first of the Thursday matinees, but on the afternoon of September tenth Miss Roberts will give a special performance of the famous Duse role in D'Annunzio's "La Gioconda."

A New Camille

The part of Marguerite Gauthier always offers strong inducements to the emotional actress, and I have never seen a Camille yet who acted the role in just the same way. Every one had her own little original touches. Eugenie Thais Lawton's impersonation at the Central is on the old lines, but she introduces business that makes it seem like a new Marguerite. In the scene with Monsieur Duval she draws tears from the most hardened Camille-goer. Mayall is an ideal Armand, and wakes up the few lethargics in the audience by his acting in the gaming scene. Shumer is De Varville and Webster Armand's father, both being acceptable in the roles. One could not ask for a more congenial Prudence than Georgie Woodthorpe.

Sam Edwards, who is a Mystic Shriner and a popular clubman all along the line, received the biggest kind of a glad hand on his Orpheum opening. Edwards used to be one of the stars of the companies Frohman sent this way, appearing in lively comedies of "All the Comforts of Home" order. He is a genial wit and his comedy, as shown in the farce "A Pass for Two" is of the unctuous order, and most amusing. The rest of the Orpheum's bill is above the average, especially good being Keough and Ballard's sketch, "A Vaudeville Surprise," and Larkins and Patterson, the colored stars.

The Old Morality Play

Last Sunday the "Everyman" company, twenty-two English actors and actresses, arrived in this city after making the unprecedented jump from London to San Francisco. Under the direction of Mr. Ben Greet, of the Elizabethan Stage Society of London, the company is now rehearsing at Lyric hall, where it opens its engagement on September second. The first actual performance will be given before the students and faculty at California University on September first, after which the company will open at Lyric hall. When the local engagement is finished, the "Everyman" company will give an out-door performance of "Twelfth Night" in the Greek theatre at Berkeley. This will be followed by performances of "Everyman" at Leland Stanford University and at Alameda—the latter for the benefit of the local high school and under its auspices. It is Mr. Greet's purpose, he says, to infuse into the performance more of the mediæval atmosphere than it has ever had before. There will be none of the environments of the modern theatre: no curtain, no footlights and no visible orchestra. The action will be continuous, lasting one hour and forty minutes and the audience will be requested to applaud at no time during the play. "Everyman" is essentially religious in character. It depicts the history of man from the cradle to the fixing of his everlasting destiny. God, looking down from on high, sees the wickedness of mankind. In wrath He bids Death summon "Everyman" (mankind) to take a long pilgrimage and make his last reckoning. Tears, entreaties and bribes avail not. The only respite is that the doomed man may be accompanied by whoever of his companions will follow him. But in vain does he apply to Fellowship, Goods and Kindred; all flee when they learn that the pilgrimage means death. None but Good Deeds abides with Everyman, for even Beauty, Strength,

To Gather Material and Ideas

George Lask, I hear, is soon to sever his connection with Fischer's to take a trip to Europe to study the latest wrinkles in stage management. I do not know by whom he will be succeeded, but I think the management will find it difficult to secure a man equally capable. Lask has a genius for handling choruses and producing effective stage pictures, and he is most valuable to a stock company because he keeps in touch with theatrical affairs all over the country and is always up to date. He was handicapped at Fischer's by the limited space on which he operated, but he succeeded in investing the performances with vim and color. Ferris Hartman is another stage manager who is soon to leave for a trip to Europe. He is going in the interest of the new Tivoli, and he expects to secure some new material for the next comic opera season. Among other things he will probably bring back a few new jokes and perhaps some new people.

The Tivoli grand opera season will open Monday night with "Aida" as the bill. The title role will be taken by Lina de Benedetto and Adelina Tromben will first be heard as Lucy Ashton in "Lucia," the alternating bill. Sig. Dado has consented to play the small part of the King in "Aida." The orchestra has been largely augmented and the operas will be put on with the most sumptuous dressing. The new company is one of the finest ever gathered together for an operatic season here.

Amelia Bingham devotes some of her profits every year to buying property in her native town, Hickville, Ohio. Miss Bingham says there's no beauty about Hickville but she's doing her best to absorb the town. "At first," she said recently, "I bought a feed store and, as the stock went with it, found myself in possession of sacks of grain, flour, oats and corn. My agent sold all the contents of my feed store except the flour so I bought a bakery to work that off. Then I began to buy Hicksville in by sections. One good way of making known your love for your native town is to buy it."

"That's a good idea," returned Maurice Levi, "I think I will buy Dublin."

Margaret Illington, Dan Frohman's beautiful fiancee, who made a hit here with Sothern, is to be the star of "A Japanese Nightingale" when Klaw & Erlanger put the Onata Watana novel on at Daly's. Miss Illington, by the way, hailed originally from Chicago.

Elfie Fay was a chorus girl in "Mam'selle Hawkins" when her peculiar humor began to be noticed. Her father, the late Hugh Fay, was master of a certain dry and quiet humor, and his daughter got her inheritance straight from him.

Dick Jose is heading a minstrel show with his name and contra-tenor. They appeared in Salt Lake City recently but did not get good press notices. One critic said of it, "All in all a fiercer company is seldom seen on the stage—unless it is going from Challis to Blackfoot."

William Lewers will support Bertha Galland in her starring tour in "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall."

were rewarded by a scholarly and scientific discourse. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall bases his deductions in regard to psychic phenomena entirely on practical, scientific research. He believes that there is nothing "supernatural" in any manifestations of what is usually termed "occult." All phenomena, whether chemical or spiritualistic, he believes to be a manifestation of the same force, electro-chemical energy. For the benefit of his audience the coming Sunday night, September the sixth, Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has arranged to have Dr. Albert J. Atkins give a short address on his recent discovery that oxygen is not life, as has been generally supposed by physiologists. What the substance is, that gives life through the atmosphere, will be the point of Dr. Atkins's remarks.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Margaret Anglin's wonderful Camille was one of the dramatic events of last season. The play will be put on next week at the Columbia and already the advance sale is enormous. "The Iron Master" comes next.

"Mrs. Dane's Defense" scored the expected hit at the California at the Thursday matinee. It will be given all next week, with Lillian Kemble as Mrs. Dane. On Thursday and Saturday of next week, special matinees of "East Lynne" will be given. The attraction for the following week will be the great Daly-theatre success, "Notre Dame," which has never been seen here. That will be the farewell offering of the Neill-Morosco company.

There will be a packed house at the Alcazar to greet Florence Roberts. Her play "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" is new to us, but Miss Roberts is one of the most popular stars that ever played an engagement in San Francisco.

"Aida" will be the opening bill of the Tivoli's new grand opera season. "Lucia" will be given on alternate nights.

The famous Pollard Lilliputian opera company, fifty in number, who scored so successfully at the Tivoli not long ago, will open their Grand engagement in "The Belle of New York." Daphne Pollard is the star and among the new people is Teddy McNamara, a comedian of exceptional ability and versatility. The performances by these little people are complete in every detail, and the talent they show is far ahead of that displayed in many adult companies. Saturday and Sunday matinees will be given from September fifth. During the Pollard engagement the following prices will prevail: night, fifteen, twenty-five, fifty and seventy five cents; matinees, fifteen, twenty-five and fifty cents.

The management of Fischer's having firmly decided not to run any of its shows longer than four weeks, "The Big Little Princess" and "Quo Vass Iss" will be taken off after one more week to make room for "The Con-Querors" and "The Glad Hand." For the new bill expensive preparations have been going on for three months, and the scenery, costumes and the paraphernalia will in every way excel all previous efforts. "The Con-Querors" is a burlesque of the Paul Potter play we saw at the Alcazar some seasons back, and in "The Glad Hand" will appear a new beauty, May Arlie, one of the famous George Edwardes Gayety company of London. She will do a champagne dance. Fischer's will have a special matinee September ninth.

"The Great Ruby," the Central's new bill, is a fine melodrama that was first put on by Daly in New York, the cast including famous stars. The production requires a wealth of scenery, and the cast of characters includes thirty-five speaking parts. The drama opens in a palace of gems, with the unfolding of an elaborate plot of the diamond thieves, who succeed in securing as booty, the ruby of fabulous price. Then follows a sensational pursuit of the robbers, the story concluding at a military tournament where some marvelous occurrences occur.

Lew Bloom, the great tramp comedian, and Jane Cooper, the talented actress, will reappear at the Orpheum after a long absence, in "A Picture from Life." T. Nelson Downs, the original and famous "King of Coins," comes direct from the Empire theatre, London, making his first American appearance in five years. Oliver LaVine, May La Vine and Tudor Cameron will appear for the first time here in "My Demented Friend." Marguerite and Hanley, hand balancers, will offer the novel act which has won them fame all over the world. Edwin Keough and Dorothy Ballard in "A Vaudeville Surprise," the Fleury trio, Sam Edwards and his company, and Larkins and Patterson will continue.

George Austin, who presents the most amusing wire-walking act before the public, will make his first appearance at the Chutes. The Olson brothers, expert banjoists who also play on other string instruments, promise a novelty. Spaulding, known as "the man with the cuff," will give a comedy acrobatic act and Lorain and Howell, "the elastic swells," will give a sketch abounding in singing and dancing. —The Playgoer.

Among the many charming creations to be shown at The Emporium's Opening Fall Exhibit, which begins Monday, August thirty-first, is a magnificent gown designed by Maurice Mayer, Paris, of point de esprit on mousseline de soie over white silk. It is a dream of loveliness.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Scheel Symphony

A French critic has declared that no man can really speak on Shakespeare, but only of himself in his relation to Shakespeare. And like the author of Hamlet, like the Bible, like Homer, Beethoven is big, universal, noble, written in the "grand style," truly heroic. There is no one interpretation of infinite music such as his. Nevertheless, to lead the "Third Symphony" as Fritz Scheel led it last Tuesday needs more than mere musical ability; it needs brains, largeness, imagination, knowledge of life. Thus to know Beethoven is to be liberally educated. With the remark of the French critic in mind, to say that Fritz Scheel reads the immeasurable composer aright is doubtless unwise, but there can be no doubt that he has something definite to express of himself in his relation to Beethoven—something delightful for music-lovers to hear. The second movement (marcia funebre) is my choice. The Mendelssohn "La Fileuse" was as happy as could be, and the audience had the good taste to insist on hearing it a second time. "The Swan of Tuonela" (Jean Sibelius), like Chinese monotones, led no whither and left the ear unsatisfied. The Berlioz beginning and the Nicolai ending were, to my mind at least, far from being the alpha and omega of the symphony. And why the "Valse de Concert" (Alexandre Glazounow), suggestive of champagne suppers and parquet floors? Oh, well—Herr Scheel knows men (and women) no less than he does music.

Why the Dates Were Changed

It was not any eccentric desire on the part of Fritz Scheel, or a freak of business manager Howard, that caused the dates of the symphony concerts to be twice changed. The idea was first to give them on Thursdays, and everything was arranged to that end. Then conflicting rehearsals and matinees made it seem more convenient for the majority of the musicians to make Fridays the dates. Notice to this effect went out when—presto! again theatre orchestra rehearsals came into play, and after much talk Tuesdays were found to be the only absolutely available dates. But Tuesday suits everybody, judging from the large audience gathered in the opera house at this week's concert. There was a large sprinkling of society, and many teachers with their pupils. Music students should not fail to attend these concerts, for nowhere else could they gain better instruction or a clearer idea of the best things in music. Scheel has grown too stout and unpoetic in appearance to magnetize the matinee girl, but the thoughts the impressionable feminine formerly bestowed upon the leader's looks she can now give to the work of his baton. There's no lack of poetry there. The program next Tuesday will contain two novelties, the prelude to the second act of "Zugwelde" by Max Schilling, and Edvard Greig's "Symphonic Danse No. 4." Other numbers will be Goldmark's overture "In Spring"; the Mozart symphonie in E flat major, Schubert's B minor (unfinished) symphonie and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

What Krehbiel Said of Scheel

H. E. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune wrote of Fritz Scheel, when the latter was conducting the Philadelphia symphony orchestra: "Mr. Scheel is obviously a master of his craft—a disciplinarian who obtains results. He presents his demands plainly, unmistakably, and receives a prompt and ungrudged response. His men seem to yield willing obedience."

Mr. Joseph Greven has had to open a large down town office in the Murphy building in addition to his studio at his residence in Golden Gate avenue, near Fillmore, to satisfy the demands of his many pupils. The next costumed operatic recital by Mr. Greven's pupils will take place in Native Sons' hall in the beginning of October.

A Quarter-Century of Existence

On September first the Bostonians will celebrate their twenty-fifth anniversary. The company is the oldest one of its kind in the United States and there are few older in Europe. Henry Clay Barnabee and W. H. Macdonald still remain, of the original management, with the organization, also George Frothingham who not long ago boasted that he had appeared in over two thousand of the Bostonians' performances. When Barnabee was last out here he told how the company happened to be formed. It started as an experiment to fill a gap caused by the failure of a play at the Boston Opera House. "Pinafore" was then the rage and it was suggested that some Boston singers should produce it. One of the Boston papers referred to the selected singers as "an ideal" company, so they concluded to call themselves the Boston Ideals. in the original cast were Mary Beebe, Myron Whitney and Frothingham. The next season, the company then being regularly formed, Miss M. F. Ober and Mr. and Mrs. Macdonald joined, and several light operas were produced. It was in 1887 that the Ideals became the Bostonians, Henry Watterson of the Louisville Courier-Journal christening the infant organization. He has been called "godpapa" by the Bostonians ever since. "Don Quixote" was the first opera of the new company. It was given here but did not please the critics, though the public liked the Bostonians in any old thing. "Robin Hood," "The Knickerbockers," "The Ogalallas," "Maid of Plymouth," "Prince Ananias," "A Wartime Wedding," "The Serenade," "Rip Van Winkle," "Ulysses," "Rob Roy," "The Smugglers of Badayez" and "The Viceroy" came afterward. The first visit to San Francisco was in 1889 at the Baldwin, the same season Booth and Barrett were at the California. Among the singers who were included in the Bostonians at different times were William Whitney, the great basso, Eugene Cowles, Tom Karl the tenor, Edwin Hoff, also tenor, Jessie Bartlett Davis, Carrie Milzner Hamilton, Alice Neilsen, Geraldine Ulmer who married Ivan Carryll the London composer, Fatmah Diard, Adelaide Phillips the contralto, Helen Bertram, Marie Stone, who is Macdonald's wife, Nelye Giusti and others. Josephine Bartlett has always been one of the company's stand-bys.

Little Kathleen Parlow and her violin were the sensation of the Press Club jinks last Friday night, given in honor of visiting G. A. R. men and their wives. Little Kathleen rendered her numbers with rare skill and intelligence and was twice recalled.

Not Part of the Libretto

During a recent rehearsal in an Eastern opera house of "Faust," a scene not on the bills was enacted. The stage director was cross, the various imps, witches and goblins in very good humor. The merriment finally reached such a pitch that the stage director couldn't stand it. Swinging his arms viciously, and stamping his foot with a bang, he cried:

"Ladies and gentlemen, kindly remember that you are not at Whitefish bay, but in hell! I beg your pardon."

Money for Fun

Cash Prizes to be given for Riddles. A pleasing, instructive and entertaining Contest announced

"Riddles are the oldest extant form of humor, and riddle-making has always been recognized as the highest type of intellectual wit," says the D. Ghirardelli Co. manufacturers of Ghirardelli's Cocoas and Chocolates. This enterprising firm has announced a Riddle Contest, offering substantial cash prizes for the best riddles made from the "Story of Ground Chocolate," an interesting talk on Cocoa and Chocolate.

The sum of $1,000 divided into one hundred and ninety-one prizes, ranging from $2.50 to $100, will be awarded contestants.

This "Contest" is open to every one, and besides being highly instructive and entertaining is absolutely free from all purchase conditions or any of the irksome duties usually connected with prize contests. It is fully expected that the oddness of this competition, together with the unusual liberality of the awards, will involve people of all ages and tastes in the merry pastime of making riddles.

It will greatly assist contestants to read the "Story" of Ground Chocolate, and follow the simple rules of this Riddle Contest, which are now ready for distribution, and will be mailed free to any one, addressing Mr. F. J. Cooper, Advertising Manager, 36 Geary St., San Francisco, Cal.

The Difference in Sex

When a girl with the semblance of a voice goes East to study, with avowed operatic aspirations, there's always a lot in the papers about her "great career," "promising future" and that sort of thing. When a young man goes, one scarcely hears anything about the flitting. Two of Cantor Stark's pupils left this week for New York to continue their vocal studies in the American Opera School (Reginald De Koven's). Chester Rosekrans has a good lyric tenor voice and Hyram Page a fine basso cantante. The latter hails from Stockton. Both young men are ambitious and look forward to an operatic career.

The dailies contained brief mention, the other day, of the death in Paris of Rosina Stoltz at the age of ninety, but merely referred to her as a once famous singer. Rosina Stoltz was the woman for whom Donizetti wrote "La Favorita," and it was a tradition in Paris that no other woman ever sang the role as she did. But that happened sixty-three years ago. She has not sung since the '50's.

The Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of amateurs, Giulio Minetti, president and director, will give three evening concerts during the season of 1903-4, in November, February and May. Rehearsals take place Monday evenings at Curtaz & Co.'s hall, from whom further particulars may be obtained and in whose care applications for membership should be sent to the society.

Although it is a long way off to the Patti concerts inquiries for particulars are coming in from all over the coast. Patti brings a large organization of musical celebrities with her to San Francisco.

Madame Norelli, Colonel Savage's new soprano, is a San Francisco girl who has sung in Paris and London. She makes her American debut in "Lucia."

Arthur Pryor, the soloist of Sousa's band, is to start a band of his own. He will have fifty musicians, and will tour.

Blum-Gerson of Paris will be represented by several beautiful gowns at the Opening Fall Exhibit of the Emporium which begins Monday, August thirty-first. One striking costume is of very fine Venetian cloth and point de esprit lace, strapped with white French broadcloth.

Designs by Sarah Mayer, Blanch Lebouvier, Maurice Mayer, Beer, Driscoll, Leroy, Braunstein, Pardoux, and many other famous modistes will be shown at this exhibit, which promises to surpass all previous displays made by the Emporium.

LETTERS

"In the Guardianship of God"

This is a volume containing seventeen short stories by Flora Annie Steele, of which the initial tale gives the title to the book. It would be late in the day to attempt any characterization of this writer's work. She has been too long identified with literature, and too well known as chronicler of that strange land of which, though known superficially to many, yet retains its mystery for all but the very few of the elect. There is a charm and fascination about these stories such as is seldom met with. Mrs. Steele shows a sympathetic insight into the idiosyncrasies of the natives and she and Kipling supplement each other. After reading a book by either author we are convinced of the truthfulness and accuracy of the other. Most of the stories in the present volume are reminiscent of the Mutiny though there are a sufficient number in which no mention of the "Time of Trouble," as the natives euphemistically designate it, is made. It is difficult to select one or two, or half a dozen stories for special mention, since whichever ones are singled out will leave the remainder of the sixteen, just as good, unnoticed. It is seldom that one finds a volume in which all are of such uniform merit. That pathetic little creature, the English child in India, figures often, and in "Little Henry and His Bearer" we are given the merest glimpse at a member of that strange caste, "the stranglers, who, under the delusion that they are obeying the commands of Kali, used to travel about killing bands of travelers for no definite reason except to shed blood in the approved fashion." "The Shahbash Wallah" was at least as important a charcter as a walking delegate and infinitely more useful. "Surabhi" is a tale of famine and of the love of an old Hindoo for his cow. "On the Old Salt Road" is a story of the supernatural. The prevailing note is one of sadness but not of gloom, and the happy owner of the book will be apt to turn to it often. Mrs. Steele is acknowledged to be one of the best living writers of stories and this volume shows no falling off in her power. It is published by the Macmillan Company in a binding uniform with that of all her later works.

The Kempton-Wace Letters

Though published anonymously, the secret has been long known that the "Kempton-Wace Letters" are the joint work of Jack London and Anna Strunsky. Why there should have been any concealment is one of the mysteries of publishing ethics, for the youth of the authors not only does not detract from the interest but adds to it. The theme of the correspondence is love. Herbert Wace, a post-graduate student of economics at the University of California, has engaged himself to marry Hester Stebbins, a scientific student at Stanford. He communicates his intentions to his foster-father, Dane Kempton, an English poet, and between them the subject of love is thoroughly thrashed out in all its phases and bearings. Herbert Wace is logical, scientific and practical. He believes that marriage is designed for the perpetution of the race and that love, as ordinarily understood, is quite unnecessary. Since, in successful marriages, the parties settle down to post-nuptial affection and rational esteem, he thinks it is sufficient and much more sensible to begin there. Dane Kempton, on the other hand, maintains that romantic love is the only justification for marriage and that unless there is that to start with there is apt to be nothing at all later on. Of course it is not to be expected that when the two men hold such diametrically opposite views, either converts the other, but notwithstanding the plain speaking in which each indulges, there is affection enough between them to keep them from ever verging upon a quarrel. One might say that the Wace point of view throughout is masculine, while the Kempton presentment is feminine. The young lady in the case is kept in the background and the arguments are in the main impersonal, but in the final adjustment hers is the casting vote. Remembering that she is both a woman and a student of science, there is ample room for doubt as to what course she will pursue, and readers are kept in suspense till the last page. Only those who have formed the reprehensible habit of looking at the end of a book before they come to it will be able to foretell the outcome. There is small likelihood that the "Kempton-Wace Letters" will be named amongst the best-sellers. The book will not appeal to every one and least of all to the habitual devourer of fiction. There is too much matter-of-fact logic and reason about it for them, but for the select few who know a good thing when they get it there is both meat and drink. If lovers were ever amenable to reason one might prescribe a course of "Professor Wace," who, so far as argument is concerned, has decidedly the better of it. There is nothing in the book to shake the confidence that Jack London will go far in his literary career. Judging him by the evidence of the Wace letters alone, one would not suspect him of the ability to write romance, but his stories of the northland have proved him to be a master in that field. Now it would not be a bit surprising to find him writing poetry, and good poetry, too. [Published by the Macmillan Company.]

As a sort of postscript to the reports of the fabulous fortunes made by successful authors, the British list of Civil Pensions was recently enriched by the names of Rhoda Broughton and Justin McCarthy, who are to receive, respectively, seventy-five and two hundred and fifty pounds. Both have written exceptionally successful books and one would naturally suppose that they would be far above that condition of impecuniosity to which people are believed to be reduced when they apply for or accept public aid. Rhoda Broughton lived in what was described as a "charming house," at Richmond, next door to the one occupied by Lady Cook, who was Tennie C. Claffin, in a style which was far from suggesting the necessity for a civil pension. However, when it is a question of getting something out of the public purse without rendering an equivalent, there is no following the vagaries of minds or consciences. —The Bookworm.

Two Ways of Looking at It

"There's a big difference between the German and American methods of the higher education for women," observed the Professor.

"What is it?" asked the Co-ed.

"Well, the American trend is to make girls independent of marriage," said the Professor, "While in Germany it is to make them better wives. There they are trained with a view to making them companionable and useful to the men they marry."

"While here," said the Co-ed, "I suppose you think it is rather to show them that they are as good as any man they might marry." —The Chaperon.

One of the most elegant imported gowns ever brought to this city is the marvelous creation in white, by Beer of Paris, which will be one of the features of next week's Opening Fall Exhibit at the Emporium. It is a combination of real Duchess and Irish point lace, with a perfect shower of over five hundred dainty white silk pon-pons in relief.

"I don't believe he has a conscience."

"I think he has, though it is perhaps merely rudimentary."

"Why do you think so?"

"His wife caught him flirting the other day, and he appeared to be distressed."

HOTEL PLEASANTON.

Since the advent of Mr. de Wolfe as proprietor of the Hotel Pleasanton many unique and modern features have been added to this noted hostelry. The main dining-room, by its recent renovation, is today conceded to be the finest in the city. The color effect is of red and gold with cream-colored ceiling, white and gold window drapings. One hundred and thirty-two electric lights with white frosted ball shaped globes shed their rich soft rays on the matchless linen that covers the thirty-four tables in the large room. The tables and chairs are of weathered oak, the seats of the latter being red leather harmonizing with the surroundings. The small dining-room has been arranged similar to the main one except that a green effect is carried out in place of the red. On September first the main hallway will be carpeted with heavy red Wilton of Turkish design.

"I hear that Sir Thomas intends coming back next year to renew his efforts to lift the cup."

"With Shamrock IV?"

"No; with Derrick I."

Mosaic Laws for Bathers

Now that swimming is the fad of the day for summer girl and summer man, it might be well to commit the following ten commandments, from a distinguished German physician, to memory:

1. When suffering from violent excitement, do not bathe.
2. When suffering from suddenly occurring or continued illness, do not bathe.
3. After sleepless nights or continued exercise, do not bathe, unless you first rest a few hours.
4. After meals, and especially after taking alcoholic liquors, do not bathe.
5. Take your time on the way to the bathing house or beach.
6. On arriving at the beach inquire about depths and currents of water.
7. Undress slowly, but then go directly into the water.
8. Jump in head first, or, at least, dip under quickly, if you do not like to do the first.
9. Do not remain too long in the water, especially if not very robust.
10. After bathing, rub the body to stimulate circulation, and then dress quickly; then take moderate exercise.

Hearst on Roosevelt

Mr. William R. Hearst has the courage of his convictions. He is convinced that Teddy Roosevelt is unfit to hold the high office of President of these United States, and he doesn't hesitate about telling people just what he thinks. He considers it his duty as a newspaper publisher to inform the public on the subject of Mr. Roosevelt's delinquencies, and therefore he fulminates against the President editorially every little while, and in a most savage manner. People who do not understand the newspaper business, who do not esteem Mr. Hearst, and who know that he is booming himself for President in the columns of his own papers, grow wildly indignant over the bitter attacks on the nation's Chief Magistrate. They are laboring under the delusion that it is Mr. Hearst's personal ambition that prompts him to swat the President. In other words, they think that he is trying to enhance his own value as Presidential timber by depreciating that of Roosevelt. The assumption is quite natural, and Mr. Hearst as an intelligent man is certainly aware that the policy of his papers is bound to be misconstrued. Therefore it must be conceded that he has the courage of his convictions, for he is fulfilling his duty to the public in his newspaper capacity even at the risk of defeating his own ambition. The average strategic politician, were he in Mr. Hearst's position, would refrain from abusing his prospective opponent in a contest for high office. There is a popular prejudice against indulging in vitriolic personalities even in the heat of a campaign, but Mr. Hearst is a newspaper publisher first, and a candidate for President later on. However, there are those who believe that he is being advised by the same people who induced him to restore the slanderous McNab to political power, and to withhold his support from Schmitz in the fight against Casey. Probably that evenly-balanced and profound philosopher, Mr. Livernash, is managing Mr. Hearst's campaign.

Making Ready in China

Edward Clough, whose correspondence from the Orient is appearing in the Examiner, and some of whose letters have appeared in Town Talk, is the most intelligent newspaper man who has visited the Far East in many years. In addition to being a brilliant and incisive writer, he is a man of keen observational powers, endowed with a faculty for grasping the principles of government, and a rare ability for the discussion of practical questions. He is writing history from the Orient, and he has made the situation in China luminous to readers in the Occident. It is evident from what he has written that the Chinese are preparing to settle, in their own way, the problem that the Christian nations have long been discussing. The longer the partition of China is delayed the better able will the Chinese become to prevent the consummation so devoutly wished. From what Mr. Clough tells us it appears that the heathen has at length been converted to the belief that in time of peace it is well to prepare for war. There are some wise statesmen in China and they have imported foreign engineers, foreign gun-makers and foreign military geniuses to properly equip an army. Chinese arsenals are turning out big guns and ammunition, and judging from the volume of the output it will not be very many years before the vast empire is prepared to warn the Powers against trespassing in Manchuria or any other Chinese province.

Revival of Know-Nothingism

A revival of the old Know-Nothing sentiment of the middle of last century is threatened in New York and the New England States. The great flood of immigration of recent years from Southern and Eastern Europe is the pretext for agitating the "native American" spirit once more. But there is no longer the dread of a "Catholic invasion" to stimulate the sentiment which is once more asserting itself. The agitators are repeating the demand made by the Know-Nothings of the period between 1850 and 1860, that the time of residence preliminary to naturalization be extended to twenty years, and they further urge that an educational qualification be required in immigrants, on the ground that the great number of illiterates now arriving on immigrant steamers will tend to produce deterioration in the population of this country, and that our educational institutions, social and political, will be injuriously affected. At a recent meeting of the "Associated Republicans" of Kings county, New York, their president said that he would make an educational qualification for immigrants a leading Republican issue "in the near future," and under it he would raise the cry of "protection to American labor, protection to the American people, protection to American institutions and protection to the American future." There was the same talk of "national deterioration" when the original Know-Nothing movement was started in the middle of last century, but this country has made its most substantial progress since that period. However, there should be no objection to the requirement of an educational qualification with a view to the restriction of undesirable immigration. Indeed there is probably a strong public sentiment in favor of imposing such a qualification, but not through any fear of "national deterioration." The experience of this country has been that it is advisable to dilute the native blood with the alien fluid. The process preserves the democracy of the country, and stimulates public spirit. An enfeebled public spirit is always the result of the ascendancy of the aristocracy. Instead of worrying ourselves over the influx of foreign hordes we should be most concerned with the necessity of distributing the immigrants over the vast unsettled territory that awaits development. How to prevent the ignorant masses from concentrating in the large centres of population is the problem which is most urgent of solution at present.

Perplexing the Fair Sex

If woman were to give ear to all the suggestions made by wise men nowadays, as to what she should do and refrain from doing, she would soon be badly perplexed. Fortunately for her own peace of mind she does as she pleases. For a long time she was lectured by wise men on the evils that result from the use of the corset. She was told that it not only ruined her own health but that it played havoc with the health of her offspring. But she smiled pleasantly and laced a little tighter. Now the savants of Europe assert that the corset is indispensable; it supports certain muscles, and preserves the form without injury to the health unless improperly worn. She has been similarly warned about other matters, and subsequently advised that what she was doing was all right. Some time ago she was urged to remove her hat in church, it being the theory of certain clergymen that a display of millinery diverted the thoughts from spiritual matters. The only women that heeded the suggestion were the members of the congregation of an Episcopal church at Carlyle, Ill., presided over by the Rev. A. A. Cairns. They were advanced exponents of the new fashion, and as a consequence they scandalized the rector. Mr. Cairns is a newcomer and when he saw the women hatless at evening service he was shocked. After thinking the matter over he posted this notice: "Women and girls are requested not to attend church in their bare heads." To add weight to his own authority he presently recalled certain regulations laid down by Paul in I Corinthians XI, showing that it was unbecoming and shameful in a woman to appear bareheaded in church. But in calling attention to Paul's words he reminded his congregation of views that no longer appeal to the fair sex. The twentieth century young woman does not concede that man is her ruler and that she was made for him. Therefore the Rev. A. A. Cairns did not make a hit by quoting the words of Paul addressed to the Corinthians. The young women of Carlyle do not believe it is immodest to go bareheaded to church. Perhaps they think that a rector who is so easily scandalized is too good for this world. Since he considers it immodest for a woman to exhibit her uncovered head it would be interesting to note the effect on him of a ball-room filled with women in regulation costume.

The Bloodthirsty Christian

The false report that our Vice-Consul at Beyrout had been assassinated by the unspeakable Turk fired the fighting blood of many of our statesmen and some of our belligerent clergy. They were unanimously in favor of taking "summary action." Mr. Allan McDermott, Congressman from New Jersey, said, "The death of a million Turks would not atone for the assassination of our Vice-Consul." Mr. McDermott is a bloodthirsty statesman. He is evidently as much in need of a christianizing influence as the Sultan himself. The religion of civilization has not done much for him. He would be in favor of a war of atonement and revenge and the slaughter of innocents, for he thinks that by blood alone can a nation expiate the murder of the diplomatic representative of a foreign country. And some of our good Christian clergymen are disappointed at the attitude of the United States toward the Macedonian revolt. They think we should assist in driving the Turk out of Europe because the unspeakable one is discourteous to the missionary who insists on prescribing the precise route he should take to heaven. This country has no desire to undertake the driving out of the Mussulman. The fact is that we no longer approve of revolutions. We rushed to the rescue of the Cubans and the Filipinos, and now we have all the territory we can take care of. We have become conservative, and besides Turkey is far away and Russia will attend to her case at the proper time. It would be much easier to remove the Christians from Turkey than it would be to remove the Turks from Christian Europe, so why not adopt the simpler solution of the problem?

There Was Nothing In It

Another insidious lie nailed! Some months ago it was reported by cable that King Edward VII, the first gentleman in Europe, the arbitre of fashion, the most punctilious of royalties, the stickler for correctness in dress who always wears the right thing at the right time, had appeared in public with the crease in his trousers' legs coinciding with the seams, running, that is to say, down the side instead of the front. Instantly the news spread over the English-speaking world that the King had introduced a new fashion, and some few there were in this country who were bold enough to follow it. And now it turns out that the King had no more intention of introducing a new fashion than he did some years ago when he forgot one morning to utilize the last button of his waistcoat. The report of the side-crease fashion was hunted down by the London correspondent of the Haberdasher, and he declares it to be absolutely false and founded upon "a gratuitous ignorance of facts well known to all properly informed people." It had its origin in a simple circumstance. The King had dressed to inspect a new river launch, and in accordance with the best sartorial traditions, he wore a flannel boating suit. "Now every one knows," as the Haberdasher correspondent says, "that flannel trousers lose the creases put into them on purpose, and acquire new and undesirable ones by accident." Thus it was that King Edward happened to appear with his trousers creased sideways. So after all there was no occasion for the fashionable world to become agitated. It was all a mistake. The King is still wearing the old familiar crease down the front, and as he believes that it gives the impression that his pudgy legs taper, there is no probability of his instituting a change.

Good Matches

Coupled with the announcement in a daily paper, some time ago, of the engagement of a young woman in society to the son of wealthy parents, was the statement that she had made "a good match." The young man is well known among his acquaintances as a prosperous rowdy. Though he is approaching his thirtieth year he never earned a dollar by honest effort, and though he is a college graduate, he is lacking in culture, in refinement and in mental poise. Yet the young woman has made "a good match" according to the standards by which matrimonial alliances are judged these days. The girl that marries a man old enough to be her grandfather is considered lucky by the world of society, if he be possessed of great wealth, and popular opinion is not affected by the knowledge that he is a vicious old roue. Under the absurd rule by which the most important facts of life are withheld from young girls many of them have not the faintest notion of the misery involved in a loveless marriage. Unfortunate indeed are many of those who have married in ignorance of the moral and mental and physical characteristics of those they have chosen for life partners. But society measures the fitness of a man who is about to take the matrimonial plunge solely by his financial status, and the only question it asks with regard to every marriage is "Is it a good match?" The answer depends on the amount of money involved. If the young man be poor, the world will most emphatically say that the bride married very badly indeed. He may be a genius or an Admirable Crichton, but unless rich in the world's goods, it is not a "good match." So afflicted is society with the greed of wealth that the daughters of multi-millionaires are expected to marry rich husbands and to multiply the family fortune. Their parents would be shocked if they fell in love with young men possessing nothing but good character and rare talent. It is seldom that an American millionaire is willing to render financial aid to a worthy young man who has won his daughter's fancy. The American millionaire doesn't seriously object to the purchase of a foreign title for his charming daughter even though it means that she must marry some dissolute and unprincipled nobleman. But he would never encourage her to fall in love with a poor young man on the threshold of a career. He much prefers to consolidate two fortunes and enhance family prestige, and he gives no thought to his daughter's future happiness when the opportunity for uniting money bags is presented. The American millionaire is a snob.

Teaching Animals to Think

One M. Pierre Hachet Souplet is occupying space in the scientific journals because of his wonderful success in teaching parrots to think. At the rate that children have been taught to parrot, to the satisfaction of their instructors, there ought not to be much difficulty about the reverse of the process. But one should like to know what benefit science is to derive from studying the "language" of monkeys and the thoughts of parrots? Why should any rational human being crave to play the part of Peeping Tom and Paul Pry on the lower animals? There is no question now but that monkeys and parrots are quite as capable of connected thought as the class who entertain them at dinners, but perhaps if the animals had freedom of choice they would select other society. No one doubts the intelligence of animals or their capacity to assimilate instruction up to a certain point, but beyond that it becomes a question not of the intelligence of the animal, but of the credulity of the instructor. Any one who has watched a little child at play with a favorite kitten or dog cannot fail to have been impressed by the understanding which seems to have been established between them, and one can often hear confidences imparted and conversations carried on in which the child speaks for its playmate, apparently unconscious that it is not the animal which asks and answers questions. These professors who spend laborious days and sleepless night interpreting the language of their monkeys and parrots are no further ahead than the child with its puppy and kitten. Each interprets the animal according to his own understanding and the creatures, learning by repetition and iteration that certain sounds or motions will insure some sensual gratification, adopt the means to the end. The process is identical with that of the fond mothers who attach meaning to the babblings of their infant wonders, repeat the sounds and give the child what it apparently wants. Children of a considerable growth frequently use uncouth expressions, and it has occurred time and again that their attempts at speech were unintelligible outside of the household because, instead of learning to speak properly from imitating their elders, the elders have taken to imitating the children. The frequency with which young birds have been taught to warble the air of some popular song demonstrates the possibility of developing their imitative faculties, but the fact that in their natural state they continue to reproduce the characteristic notes of their own species shows that imitation is scarcely a natural faculty. In these days, when it is a serious question whether there is wisdom in the universal spread of education—whether it has been a kindness to the mass of mankind to open to them new avenues of desire without corresponding opportunities to gratify it, it might be well for these sanguine experimenters to pause and consider the consequences, supposing that they should succeed in teaching the lower animals to think and to demand recognition for their wants.

Nature Lore

BY HARRY COWELL

To lift a scornful lip at "book learning" is to expose more than a canine tooth. With the poet Yeats, to despise the printing press, or to make little of the machine in general, as does Ruskin, savors of ingratitude. Sublime sneers for modern progress, read in machine-made books carried by machinery to the uttermost ends of the earth, are a very short step away from the ridiculous. Modern progress is indeed a sacred thing, in that it may be of great service to the soul. Like the Sabbath, however, it exists for man, not man for it.

I am no reactionist, no ridiculous ingrate. I love my own day and am making the most of it. To say, therefore, that Nature lore is indispensable to a liberal education and must not be neglected is not to infer that "book learning" is a bad thing, deserving of scorn.

But I do think that it is necesary to remind men that the "manuscript of God" is now even better reading than it was when the young Agassiz was fifty years old and Longfellow was singing him a birthday song. To ears that have hearkened diligently to the words of Darwin, the "rhymes of the universe" come with a precious significance added to the wild, sweet beauty that was theirs of yore. Never before has the dear old nurse, Nature, told such wonderful tales.

Modern child, product of a machine age, leave the city awhile, forget your books, turn your back—politely, of course—upon civilization; hear what the hoary forests have to say to you; put your ear close to the mouth of the flower and listen; learn wisdom of the old wind, of the gray wave; the books of the running brooks are worth your while, and there is an awful eloquence in the sermons of the stones. The black-robed friar, Night, would have a word with you; he has a profundity of knowledge, various voices and a silence that is finest gold. Sit at the white feet of the ancient sea; she will tell you things of your own soul full of wonderment, unbelievable from lesser lips.

The world stuff is very wise. Scarcely a speck of dust but has by this time kept company with the soul of man. Surely the clay that was once called Socrates has not quite forgotten how to ask a great question and to answer it. The grass that grows over some graves has the power of speech. How like intelligent eyes the stars are—"speaking eyes," as the phrase is! They have secrets to communicate to you that may not pass from mouth to ear. Though you should down on your knees to receive the message of the morning sun, God would not cease to smile. Unless the moon has taught you her lore, you are a dull lover. You have never, you say, adored one of those daughters of hers, white women of mystery, who set up in the hearts of men strange longings which this world can never satisfy, no, nor the next, for they are infinite?—Never; then will your coffin be filled with a clod.

Can your historian say of you a thing to match this that Fiona Macleod said of St. Bride: "The beauty of the world was her daily food"? No, not that either. Well, I am full sorry for you—and for myself: a starveling is a piteous sight.

My boulevard friend, interminably footing the dull pavement, do you know the call of the country, the call of the country in spring? No! I don't believe a word of it. Of course you do—better than I, it may well be. But you hate to be catechised—and rightly. The significance of summer is not hidden from you; of that I am fully persuaded; you have lifted the veil of its gold and green. Many a brown study have you fallen into of autumn evenings; and winter has laid bare to you the structure of ten thousand things. You have lain on your back for hours together watching the ever-changing clouds go wind-blown between you and the blue, until the sad law of the infinite flow of things was as evident to you as it was to Heraclitus of old. You have mined the purest pale gold out of the evening sky and clothed you with its purple, and felt sorry for the millionaire. You have observed the ways of butterfly and bee, to your endless delight and edification. Right well you know how they run, the rune of the sap and the song of the leaves. The mountains have made you modest; you have learned humility of space. The heart of your forebear, the cave man, has ere now been revealed to you in a storm; and fear has lent you, my upright friend, astonishingly prehensile hands and feet. To your still Pagan soul the piping of Pan is sweet or terrible—never meaningless. Did you not drink deep knowledge yesterday from that lonely woodland spring? and the wild berries that you gathered and ate—were they not food for thought? Has not the rain instructed you in the sorrow of the world? If anything is so insignificant that it has for you no lesson, be assured that it is your studentship that is at fault.

The schooldays of the true student are never over. He is taught of all things. Nature lore and Art lore are alike his. Man is the interpreter of Nature, and Nature is the interpreter of Man. The poet is right; to know through and through the little flower in the crannied wall would be to know God and man. Pursue the study of the little flower far enough and you come inevitably to whatever of Reality and Infinity lies back of this phenomenal world.

Satan's Toast

Here's to the sins ye do and ye wish to do;
Here's to promises never kept;
Here's to lips that deny with the morning light
Tender words that they whispered at dead of night;
Here's to hearts that have died unwept.

Here's to pages ye seal when the deeds be done;
Here's to hopes that ye crush and kill;
Here's to treacheries hidden in love's caress;
Here's to times that ye're silent lest ye confess;
Here's to mem'ries that shame, and thrill.

Here's to lips that breathe love when the heart is dead;
Here's to all that I claim as mine;
Here's to ye who repent as the daylight starts
And succumb to your passions when light departs;
Here's to woman, and love, and wine.

The Saunterer

Strategic Pardee

As a political strategist Governor Pardee was a great success in Oakland, but he lacks the subtlety and adroitness for successful achievements in the broader field of State politics. Even in Oakland his cunning was transparent at times, but he managed to retain the confidence of many of his associates. But his work as Governor, say the politicians, "is very raw." They consider him a very slippery individual. One of the first to find him out was Charles Wesley Reed, who although a Democrat, was sure that he was manly and upright because he was a graduate of the State University. Charles Wesley is an enthusiastic alumnus, and he thinks that if a man is a graduate of Berkeley all the presumptions of virtue are in his favor. And yet he knows Abe Ruef. Well, Charles Wesley, being a public-spirited citizen, took a deep interest in the bills passed by the Legislature which empowered the Spring Valley Water Company to double its stock for the cinching of the ratepayers. He took the trouble to go to Sacramento and point out to Governor Pardee the purpose of the bills. The Governor appreciated the service of the public-spirited citizen and vowed that he would never approve such measures. And he kept his word so far as those particular bills were concerned. But later on a third bill was passed which gave the corporation all the power of the other two and considerable more, and the Governor signed it. Thereupon Mr. Reed stopped singing the praises of the man from Berkeley.

The Double Cross

After the Republican bosses sat down together, and entered into an alliance for the capture and distribution of the municipal patronage, Governor Pardee was communicated with and invited to join. He replied that he would be very glad to support the organization, and he notified the allied bosses that he had appointed his factotum, Charley Spear the Harbor Commissioner, to represent him. The Republican bosses were very much pleased to have the State Administration behind them, but when preparing for the primary election fight against Martin Kelly they did not receive any assistance from Spear. However they were sure that they had the Governor's sympathy and his moral support. They supposed that he was reluctant to take an active interest in the fight. But on election day they learned that the whole crew of a water-front dredger appointed by Charley Spear were out working for Martin Kelly. Thereupon it dawned upon them that the Governor was doing Oakland politics. They have had nothing to say publicly about the double-cross but they are awaiting developments. Meanwhile Charley Spear is acting as the boss of the water-front, and people who are familiar with the ways of the Pardee politicians of Oakland are wondering to what extremes he will go. The water-front is a fertile field for the political grafter and it looks as though it is going to be exploited as it never was before.

Pardee Politics in the Normal School

There is considerable uneasiness among the teachers and laborers connected with the San Jose State Normal School. Dr. Dow, a personal friend of Governor Pardee, was appointed a member of the Board of Trustees, soon after the latter became Governor, and since his appointment he has been taking a very active part in the management of the institution. At his instigation the head gardener and night watchman had to seek new positions, and the unions of San Jose trace the recent strike of the carpenters and painters who were at work on the Normal building to Dr. Dow's management. Now there is a rumor afloat that Dr. Dow is desirous of placing one of his friends on the faculty of the school, that friend being none other than Professor Childs who was formerly principal of the institution. To this, Principal Maurice R. Dailey strenuously objects, as he says there is an abundance of teachers in the school to properly handle the number of students in attendance. As the trustees do not appoint teachers until they have been nominated by the principal, Dr. Dow may be unable to land Professor Childs on the faculty. It is rumored that Childs is training for the principalship of the school. Professor Dailey was to have asked for a leave of absence for a year in order to study and travel, but recently some one whispered in his ear that if he left he might not return, so he has changed his mind and will remain at the institution.

nounced. It appears that the glamour with which women of the stage are invested is beginning to appeal to the feminine as well as to the male theatregoer, and it is quite natural that their companionship should be sought, because the woman who succeeds on the stage is always interesting. But as a rule the talented actress does not care for the society of society women; they bore her. The actress that accepts the patronage of society does so either because she is exceedingly vain, or is a climber by instinct. Society's change of attitude toward the women of the stage is due to the fact that of late years almost every stage recruit is heralded as a society woman. There are a few actresses such as Mrs. Langtry, Mrs. Potter, and Elsie de Wolfe, who mingled in really smart society before going on the stage, but nearly all the others are pretenders. Many of them have learned the higher graces of social intercourse from some polite stage manager. They may have mingled in nice, conventional church circles in Oshkosh, or St. Paul, but they were not "society women" in the usual acceptation of the term. However they have brains, to which they owe their stage success, but which would never gain them the entree to the inner circle were it not for their reputed social past.

Anent Amelia Bingham

When Amelia Bingham was here she was lionized by society, and she liked it. She is an actress of commonplace talent, but she is a very successful manager, and as she bears her husband's name on the stage the supposition is that she is the very essence of respectability. And no doubt she is, and that was why society felt confident that it could make no mistake in entertaining her. But Miss Bingham was never a society woman. Her mother kept a boarding-house, and Amelia rendered her valuable assistance. That was before she went on the stage. I believe her maiden name was Swilley, which of course would never do for stage purposes. Though a successful actress Mrs. Bingham is more accomplished as a milliner and she prides herself on her skill in fashioning stylish hats. One day when she was going to a swell tea in this city she did not have a hat that suited her, so she sent her maid out for a large flat blue straw and some blue velvet. With these and a large baby-blue feather which she had in her trunk she made what was the handsomest hat at the function.

Other Ex-Society Women

Margaret Anglin is an actress who has a keen appreciation of the attentions of society folks, and there are several of our smart set who delight in lionizing her. She has frequently been written up as an ex-society woman, which means, perhaps, that she did not go straight from a nunnery to the stage. In other words she spent some little time with her family in a far-away town in Canada, and mingled with very nice people who would probably be shocked if they knew they had been referred to as "society." Martha Waldron of the Miller company is also in the category of society actresses, and I have heard that she is quite the correct thing off the stage. She hails from Boston, and it is said of her that she could really be of the real smart set there if she wished; also, that she is an heiress, and that her family objected to her going on the stage. But Miss Waldron bids fair to become such a good actress that I cannot believe she was ever in the smart set of Boston, for of all smart sets Boston's is probably the dullest. One of San Francisco's real society girls went on the stage a few years ago, and she did not make a great success. Her family was shocked by her for choosing a stage career and prevailed on her to abandon it. She did so reluctantly and she explained that her reluctance was principally due to the fact that she had to return to be bored to death by San Francisco society. And by the way it was one of her shocked sisters who gave a tea in honor of Miss Anglin the other day.

Margaret Anglin's Sister

The talented Margaret Anglin has a younger sister, Ailene, who is engaged to Bertram C. Henry of the Henry Miller company. Much of Mr. Henry's success has been due to the influence of Miss Anglin, who has taken a great interest in him. Ailene Anglin is a beautiful girl, and at one time she was very badly stage-struck, but all her family, including Margaret, refused to encourage her. The sisters came from Toronto, and they are members of a very estimable family.

Maxine and Nat United

The domestic affairs of Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott have excited a great deal of interest of late. The rumor that they had parted company forever would not down, but despite the prognostications of the wise, Maxine has returned to her Nat, and stories of the separation have gone glimmering. These stories were founded on a private letter from London, in which it was stated that the beautiful American actress was the rage of the smart set of the metropolis. It was immediately concluded that she was ambitious of social conquests. Her friends said that though Nat Goodwin was a stepping-stone to histrionic distinction, he was only a stumbling-block so far as social success was concerned. But the popular comedian insisted that there was no foundation to the rumors, and when they were first published he assumed the air of one who was confident that he held the affections of his spouse. At the Bohemian Club midsummer jinks, he wanted all men to take notice that he was there, because, he said, it might be necessary some day to prove an alibi to Mrs. Goodwin. He had been worried by the stories in circulation and wanted his friends to know that they were groundless.

Her Interesting Past

It seems but a few years ago that the talented American actress whose surpassing pulchritude caused a sensation in London, was a resident of Oakland. She was then pretty Jessie McDermott, the daughter of a retired sea captain from Maine. There were two sisters, and the younger, Gertrude, who is now the wife of Forbes Robertson, the distinguished London actor and manager, attended Snell's Seminary. One day Jessie McDermott married her cousin, a ballplayer, and with him she went to New York, where for a short time she kept a boarding-house. Presently she drifted on the stage, and obtained an engagement with the Daly company. She played small parts for a short time, and then joined the Frawley company of this city. When she first met Nat Goodwin she was playing with the Frawleys at the Columbia. Goodwin was playing an engagement at the Baldwin. The comedian fell in love with her at first sight. One night, when he was entertaining the beautiful Maxine at dinner, he was so reluctant to part with her that he kept a Baldwin audience waiting until nine o'clock, and for a time the management thought that he wouldn't appear.

She Saved Her Money

Goodwin was then en route to Australia for a professional tour of the country, and Blanche Walsh was his leading lady. But he couldn't think of tearing himself away from the fair Maxine; so he paid manager Frawley a large sum of money to release her from her contract, and she joined the company for the Australian tour. Upon her return to this country she obtained a divorce from her husband, from whom she had been long separated, and married Goodwin. Since then she has made rapid strides in her profession and has also accumulated a fortune, for she not only received a salary, but also shared in the profits. A few years ago, when she visited this city, she told a friend that she had saved sixty thousand dollars, and that she had in addition two homes presented to her by her husband. She is a very sensible woman, and her manner is as pleasing as her beauty. The stories of her separation from Goodwin may have been started by people in the profession, who believed that she was never very much in love with the red-haired comedian, but her presence in London was of course due to the fact that she wished to be with her sister. The devotion between the two is of exceptional intensity. Those who know Maxine Elliott best say that while she may enjoy social conquests, she is not likely to have her head turned by the prospect of a match with one of the nobility. They recall that when Gertrude Elliott first went to London it was rumored that she had captured a Duke. When spoken to on the subject Maxine said she hoped it was not so; that she would regret very much a marriage between her sister and one of the degenerate nobility. She would prefer to see her sister marry an honest American. But Gertrude preferred an honest Englishman.

Kuhne Beveridge's Latest Venture

The cards received by Kuhne Beveridge's friends in this city last Saturday, in which Baron and Baroness von Wrede announce the marriage of their daughter, refer to the bride as "Mrs." Beveridge. This has led to a deal of discussion of the Coghlan bigamy, but the general opinion is that the "Mrs." was all right. Nine out of ten divorcees nowadays call themselves "Miss," and it is not easy to distinguish the married woman from the maiden in this sophisticated age. Kuhne Beveridge was married to Mr. Branson of Johannesburg at Trouville. She will probably now retire to private life in South Africa and cease to furnish material for Sunday supp. writers. She was a great favorite in South Africa during the period preceding the Boer war, and made a great deal of money out of her art. Her bust of Cecil Rhodes is one of the best things she ever did.

The Press and the Drug Trust

San Francisco's daily newspapers have been put into a very humiliating position by a representative of the Patent Medicine Trust. They have signed a contract with one of the patent medicine manufacturers, by which they are prohibited from announcing the price at which the cure-all nostrums of that particular firm may be purchased at a local drug store. How is that for a smash at the boasted liberty of the press! Once more has the all-powerful business office of the great, free and independent daily asserted itself. The joker in the contract into which the dailies have entered is designed to crush the Owl Drug Company, against which the Trust has been waging war for several months. First the Trust undertook to put the Owl Company out of business by declining to sell it any patent medicine, but to accomplish that purpose it would be necessary for the Trust to quit selling its pink pills and health restorers, for the purchasing agents of the tabooed store have ways of securing stock that its enemy has been unable to fathom. Moreover the Owl people have kept right on buying patent medicines through their agents at prices which enabled them to cut prices as of yore. They spent a lot of money advertising their mysterious patent drugs and the cut rate prices at which they could be purchased, but now their ads. no longer appear in the daily papers.

Hearst's Possible Predicament

The explanation of the failure of the Owl Company to advertise its price-list in the dailies is to be found in the contract which the papers entered into with the Miles Patent Medicine Company. It is stipulated in the contract

The Dinner Setting is Incomplete without that while it is in force no person shall be permitted to advertise its goods at less than the standard retail prices. The purpose of this proviso is to prevent the Owl Company from including the Miles' Medicines in its cut-rate price-list. The dailies sought to persude the Owl Company to eliminate that one item, but the management decided that if it could not advertise all the goods that it desired to sell at cut-rate prices, it would advertise none of them. The Owl Company has been spending a lot of money in advertising ever since its rivals undertook to drive it out of business, and now it will probably resort to methods that the dailies have long tried to discourage. The Drug Trust has been very anxious to deprive the tabooed store of the privilege of publicity, and unless the dailies experience a change of heart all the patent medicine manufacturers will hereafter insist on inserting in their advertising contracts clauses similar to the one formulated by the Miles Company. But it is believed that when Mr. Hearst comes to town and learns about the Miles contract he will have a conniption fit. If he is serious in his Presidential aspirations he will surely balk at the prospect of having the story circulated that he "stood in" with the Drug Trust in its effort to drive men out of business for insisting upon making less profit on their goods than is made by their rivals

Political Renascence of Phelan

James D. Phelan was banqueted the other night by a committee of the Native Sons, and when called on for a few remarks he said it was the most enjoyable affair he had ever attended. Since the banquet I have been told that it had some political significance, but as it was a Native Son affair I do not give the report credence. Everybody knows that the Native Sons are out of politics. However, Mr. Phelan was hailed at the banquet as the next Mayor of San Francisco, and he smiled approvingly. Some of the gentlemen present were somewhat displeased that the banquet should have been made the occasion for the launching of a political boom, but they attributed the enthusiasm of the ex-Mayor's political friends to an irresistible impulse to maintain their availability as job-chasers. Mr. Phelan has no desire to test the fickleness of the San Francisco public at the next election, but he is eager to promote reaction in popular sentiment. There has been so much dissatisfaction with the Schmitz-Ruef Administration that in some quarters, especially in the mercantile community, regrets over the downfall of Phelan have been voiced, not that he is loved more but because he is despised less than the protege of thrifty Abraham. There has been some talk in club circles and among bankers and merchants, of running Phelan for Mayor again, but artful Jimmy has no intention of making a target of himself just yet. He always did have sense enough to "stand from under," but he knows that money is a potent factor in shaping public sentiment, and he is encouraging his touts to sing his praises. He has political aspirations but they do not press for immediate fruition. Having made his peace with Hearst he will be satisfied to go to the National Convention next year, there to lick the hand that smote him.

Lask Joins Belasco

As soon as the report, which I published last week, that George Lask intended severing his connection with Fischer's theatre, reached New York, David Belasco wired him an offer to join his staff in October, and it was accepted. Lask is to take charge of the largest and most sumptuous of all the Belasco productions, "The Darling of the Gods," in which Blanche Bates is to star through the principal cities of the East. Dave Belasco is recognized today as America's premier play-producer, and a stage manager could receive no higher endorsement of his ability than to be engaged by him. I have long been an admirer of George Lask's proficiency in the technique of the stage, and I have been amused at the booming which second-rate visiting stage managers have received at the hands of local critics who never realized that the modest little man who served his apprenticeship at Morosco's in the heyday of melodrama south of the slot, and who subsequently imbued the choruses at the Tivoli and Fischer's with life and grace, far surpassed all of them. Only a few months ago, when Charles Jones came out with the Rogers Brothers shows, he was heralded as the king-pin of stage managers by the dailies. He was given as much space as some of the principals in the company. It was the same Jones who made such a miserable showing with that awful Southwell opera company at the Grand a few years ago. He staged the Rogers Brothers shows as he had seen them staged in the East, and he was credited with having accomplished great things. He was never in the same class with George Lask.

The Message That Went Too Soon

A gentleman who lives in Oakland and who was out for a little lark, outwitted himself the other night. He didn't want to go home and he didn't want to be interrupted and so he wrote out a message which he left at the telegraph office with instructions to forward it at twelve-thirty, which is five minutes after the departure of the last boat. The message said, "Have missed the last boat. Very sorry. Home early tomorrow." But the telegraph operator, wishing to clear up the business, despatched the message at ten o'clock. By eleven an answer was waiting for the man and this is what it said: "You have two hours yet. Better make that boat." Fortunately the clerk of the man's hotel knew to which French restaurant to forward the message. The man was on the last boat.

Hofmeyr in Bohemia

My paragraphs of last week in reference to the past of Dr. Adrian Hofmeyr were read with a great deal of interest in the Bohemian Club, for the ex-divine from South Africa has been looked upon by some of the members of that organization as a mysterious personage. They suspected that he was on a secret mission of some sort, and many inquiries were made about him without satisfactory results. They had never heard of his mix-up with the church authorities in South Africa, or of his being employed by Cecil Rhodes, but they knew that he was a cultured man from foreign parts, and so they lionized him within an inch of his life. Every tuft-hunter in the club from Jimmy Phelan to Jack Wilson stroked the mane of the African lion. Every one in Bohemia was blinded by the glitter of his eloquence, with the exception perhaps of Neely O'Sullivan whose sense of humor is never in abeyance. He gives a very clever imitation of Hofmeyr's lecture "For Clubmen Only."

At Wilson's Dinner

One of the funniest incidents of Jack Wilson's dinner to the Africander was the entrance of W. W. Barton and Richard Hotaling. Barton entered the Red Room accompanied by an old woman. Jack Wilson, the host, affected great displeasure and told the steward to order them out.

"Johnson, Johnson," said Mr. Wilson, "didn't I tell you to reserve this room for me? What does this mean?"

Johnson, who was not in the joke, rubbed his hands in great distress and went up to Mr. Barton, whereupon the old woman in grotesque make-up drew forth a hatchet and as Carrie Nation made it very lively for a few minutes. Later, the old woman peeled off her make-up and proved to be Dick Hotaling. The entire scene had been arranged because the dinner was impromptu and neither Mr. Hotaling nor Mr. Barton had the proper raiment on this side of the bay.

Phelan Didn't Think It Was Funny

Dick Hotaling has been doing a great many funny stunts lately. Recently President Phelan entertained a number of guests at luncheon at the Bohemian Club and among them happened to be ex-Supervisor Joe Tobin and one or two others whose ancestors came from the Emerald Isle. As the guests filed in past the small table where Mr. Hotaling was lunching that gentleman said, in a rich brogue which he well knows how to affect, "Well, God save ould Ireland." Mr. Phelan's guests all laughed, but their host maintained an impassive countenance. During the late jinks, when President Phelan was bathing one day he seemed to be in distress and the professional swimming teacher who was kept there for the purpose started out to his assistance. Simultaneously came a rich Irish brogue from the bath house, "Don't save him. Let the shpalpeen drown." This sort of thing is trying to men with sensitive souls, but then, if one can't take a joke and a good many of them, one had better not belong to Bohemia.

The Pace That Kills

The long expected report that James G. Blaine Jr. and his wife, the daughter of Rear-Admiral Hichborn, have separated will not surprise our jeunesse doree, who tried to keep pace with that "2 min. flat" young man on his last visit here. He broke more than one record the time he shot through this city on his way to the Philippines. Indeed he is said to have kept up that gait ever since he laid aside knickerbocks. His only pause was the year's penance imposed on him by his fiancee before she would consent to join him at the altar. He got through that all right, abstained from liquor and all the rest, but shortly after the marriage he is said to have lapsed and—well, the wife's return to her parents at Brattleboro and his own return to his mother's home tell the closing scene in that story. From the very start young Blaine cut out an unenviable career. He first attracted attention by eloping with the daughter of Representative Palmer and deserting her three weeks later. His friends finally rounded him into a well-known gold-cure establishment in New York. No sooner was he out than he began to pay attention to the well known Miss Beveridge but she treated him so brusquely that he endeavored to rehabilitate himself by going to the war. That brought him out here on his way to Manila. He evidently had an idea that the campaign ought to open up in this city, for he cut loose here, and made several mad dashes through the tenderloin.

His Escapade in Honolulu

From here he went to Honolulu and the hospitable islanders, under the impression that he was the son of his great father, threw open their doors to him. He had a merry time for a little while, but one night at a social function he kept the champagne corks popping at such a rate that he lost his head and was caught in the act of embracing one of Honolulu's best known matrons. The husband was enraged. He fell upon young Blaine and—well, after it was all over his friends carried him on board a vessel and he was hurried away to Manila. He proved too fast for the exceedingly fast military set then stationed in the islands and he was ordered home for conduct unbecoming an officer. It was in Washington, after his return, that he first met Miss Martha Hichborn. Notwithstanding his record she fancied him and imposed a year's probation, after exacting a promise to reform. She was a great catch and he gave the promise readily enough. The sporting friends of the young blade were sure that he would not keep his promise, but he held out for the year and led his bride to the altar just fifteen months ago.

A New Culture Club

The very lastest thing in culture clubs is the Polyglot, which Professor L. D. Ventura is organizing. This club has a really serious object and membership in it is worthy of consideration. Its chief object is to render popular the modern literature of France, Italy, Germany and Spain, and for students of these tongues to exchange ideas among themselves on social, scientific and literary topics by conversing in the language whose literature is under discussion. Professor Ventura, whose idea brought the Polyglot Club into being, was a University professor not long ago, and he lectured in French and Italian here before the Channing Auxiliary and other organizations. He has written some good books, too, and is also a contributor to magazine literature. The first entertainment of the club will be held on Thursday evening, September seventeenth, in Steinway hall, and the program arranged is certainly out of the common. Signor Domencio Borghesi, Cantor Stark and Cantor Davis will sing; Signor and Signora Ursomando will give a piano duet and the former a solo; Miss Grace Llewellyn Jones will declaim an episode from Dante, and others who will take part are Max Vanze, Senorita Alicia Cuenca, Senor Rafael de Zayas Enriquez, Signor D. Locapo, Signor Martinez and Professor Ventura. Nothing of such admirable quality has been announced in the culture club world for a long time. Among the patronesses of the affair are Mesdames Hearst, De Vecchi, Bixler, Will Crocker, Morbio, Llewellyn-Jones, Arnold, Lane and St. Goar, and Miss Murison.

The Unconventional Miss Sperry

To be unconventional in society is to be presumed to have intelligence as well as individuality. The conventianal woman is always a bore, for conventionality implies mediocrity and contentment with the commonplace. One of the most unconventional young women in society is Miss Elsie Sperry, and she is therefore interesting. She has the breeziness and independence of the American girl of the most attractive type. I am constantly hearing stories about the doings of Elsie Sperry. The latest is that she has learned how to operate a street car. She has spent a lot of time riding on dummies of late, even on the windiest days, and she mastered the tricks of the motorman's trade. Miss Sperry is a capital mimic and she could win fame on the stage as a character actress. She is skilled in the art of make-up. Some time ago a New York man visited her with a friend. He was anxious to meet her because he had heard of her beauty. When she presented herself she resembled a feminine Mr. Hyde, and the young man was terror-stricken.

Jilted a Millionaire

Miss Le Breton, who the despatches tell us has just jilted one Ham, a millionaire, is a cousin of the beautiful Alanna Marmion who recently wedded "Joe" O'Sullivan, a brother of Denis, in Paris. Miss Le Breton and her mother are said to be now on their way home from the French capital, where they have been sojourning many years. The former was engaged in vocal study. Mrs. Le Breton was "Nopie" MacDougall, the prettiest of the old Commodore's daughters. With her husband she lived in Paris after her marriage. He was the private secretary of Major Rathbone, when the latter was the United States representative in France.

The Kip-Robinson Engagement

Three years ago, when Mary Kip returned from the Philippines, her friends expected her to announce her engagement to Dr. Robinson, U. S. A., now a practicing physician of Kansas City. But they had to content themselves with mere rumors until a few days ago. Mary Kip is a distinguished looking girl, tall and brunette and resembles Lawrence in looks. Lawrence Kip was the handsome scapegrace of the family, who capped several startling escapades by becoming a Roman Catholic and thereby causing his Episcopal forefathers to turn in their graves. Mary Kip is a woman of stern dignity and hauteur, and it has been said of her that she would have made an admirable Bishop's wife. In the family circle her judgment is always respected, and her will generally prevails.

Wiltsee Back

Ernest Wiltsee arrived in San Francisco this week. He has lost no flesh or color over the episode in which he and Lieutenant Edie figured, with Mrs. Baxter Tevis and her sister as the picturesque accessories. And he does not look like the rejected suitor of a millioned widow, either. Wiltsee is not a man to lose his head to any extent over a woman. His mind is full of schemes. He is a born promoter, and he has had fairly good fortune in all his mining ventures.

Return of the Wilsons

Mr. A. W. Wilson left for New York last week to meet his wife and their daughters, Bessie and Bernice, who were due to arrive on the Kaiser Wilhelm. The daughters have been studying music in Paris, where they were joined by their mother some months ago, and with her they visited Italy and Switzerland. They will visit Bar Harbor and other watering places in the East before returning home. The Misses Wilson are very charming young women of rare culture, and they are expected to become quite active in social circles during the winter.

Joaquin Miller's Protege

Yone Noguchi has brought out another volume of poems entitled "From an Eastern Sea." This time it emanates from a London publishing house, and is attracting as much attention as did the volume produced by Mr. Doxey in this city some years ago. Yone Noguchi is the protege of Joaquin Miller. There was a story printed somewhat extensively, to the effect that the so-called poems were the outcome of practical joking on the part of Gelett Burgess, who was represented as having a grand time all to himself looking on while the literati of two continents tried to read some sense into his nonsense. If I remember rightly, it was Vance Thompson who gave currency to that story, on the strength of Burgess's own acknowledgement, but then, it doesn't follow as a matter of course that it was either true or false just because Burgess said so. Poetry is as much a matter of the reader as of the writer, and if people really like the Yone Noguchi productions, they were good enough poetry for the money.

Burgess Was Too Realistic

Gelett Burgess is making a short tour of Europe, and it is said that he crossed the ocean to escape Mary McLean, who thought she discovered in him the red devil of her dreams. A Californian writing from Trouville says that Burgess was there recently, and that he has been up to his old tricks. Hearing that Maeterlinck was summering in a cottage near the town he decided to visit that distinguished writer. Maeterlinck was taking tea on the lawn with his wife and her two female cousins when Burgess appeared on the scene and introduced himself as a literary genius from America. Maeterlinck was delighted to meet him and invited him to join them at tea. The author of the Purple Cow gladly joined the tea party, and he was soon engaged in amusing the ladies. When he thought that he had established sufficiently cordial relations he began to imitate a monkey by scrambling up a tree and leaping from branch to branch, chattering the while like a Simian who had been robbed of his mate. Suddenly the ladies took fright. It suddenly occurred to them that the eccentric individual was probably insane, and they rushed into the house followed by Maeterlinck, who had misgivings too. Burgess tried to get into the house to explain matters, but the affrighted inmates would not open the door. So Burgess footed it back to Trouville, where he related the story of his experience.

Indians Will Be Barred

There was a quarrel among the members of the Woman's Club of San Jose, the other day, which came near disrupting the plans for the big Indian pow-wow to be given under the auspices of the club. It was understood among the members that the ladies, both old and young, were to don Indian costume. Last week it was rumored that a certain group of the ladies headed by Mrs. W. C. Kennedy, president of the club, did not relish the idea of acting the part of Indian squaws for three days and nights; they would rather be witnesses than participants. They had taken up a subscription and funds had been raised to import a group of real Indians from one of the Government stations, to act as substitutes for the timid ones. When this became known matrons, belles and young gentlemen joined in an indignant protest. They said that it would be lowering their dignity enough to play Indian with other white folks, but when it came to playing Indian along with the genuine red man the indelicacy of the proceeding would appall them. Mrs. Kennedy and the other members of her committee were severely criticised for altering the plans, and for a time it looked as though the conference would degenerate into a ghost dance. But after a heated pow-wow Mrs. Kennedy and her associates decided to abide by the original program.

"Now that you are married," said the bachelor to his friend, "I suppose your charming wife expects you to live up to your ideals."

"No, she doesn't," replied the Benedict gloomily.

"I'm surprised, but I suppose you're glad."

"No, I'm not," said the newly married man, "she expects me to live up to hers."

Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Burkett of Honolulu are at Byron Springs. Others at Byron are C. B. McCarthy, Miss McNamara, Mrs. M. M. Sampson, Mrs. J. Becker and Mrs. F. T. Young of Berkeley, Charles D. Pierce, Dr. Morris, Mrs. A. O. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Stephens.

The Handiwork of a Tyro

When a document purporting to be the last will of Charles L. Fair was put on record some days ago, many people began to speculate as to whether Colonel Henry I. Kowalsky would bob up as the attorney for the legatee mentioned therein as the son of the dead millionaire. It was idle speculation. The mysterious will that made its appearance in Judge Murasky's court is too unsubstantial to receive the backing of the noted benefactor of illegitimate heirs. Nobody but a tyro in the art of juggling with justice would think of presenting a dubious will for probate that purported to have been witnessed by two dead men. The experienced juggler with justice knows that it is just as easy and much more convincing to have a will witnessed by live people ready and willing to swear to any old thing. If it were impossible to secure such witnesses then it would of course be necessary to summon the dead, but witnesses for any purpose are to be had for the asking and a small retainer.

Mamma Didn't Know

The marriage of Duke Coleman and Miss Ada Arnold, which took place at Redwood City last Friday, was spiced with a soupcon of romance. Mrs. Ingalls, the mother of the bride, never had the faintest suspicion that her daughter entertained thoughts of marriage. Mr. Coleman had conducted his courtship clandestinely, and Mrs. Ingalls was not taken into the confidence of her daughter until the latter wired her news of the marriage. The progress of the affair excited the interest of the guests of the Hotel Cecil, where Mrs. Ingalls and her daughter resided.

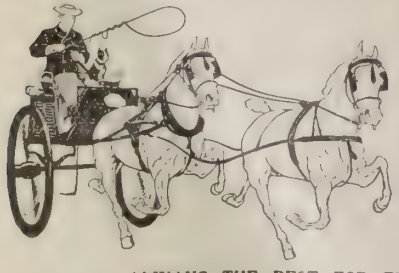
Another Duke Captures an Heiress



So England is to have another American Duchess! The British nobility is rapidly becoming Americanized. The Duke of Roxburghe whose engagement with May Goelet has been announced has been anxious to marry an American heiress for a long time, and Miss Goelet has been on a still hunt for a Duke, so both should be felicitated on having satisfied their respective heart's desire. It was May Goelet to whom Duke Boris paid considerable attention when at Newport. Her mother entertained him at dinner, and it was thought at the time that there was a possibility of a match being made. The Duke of Roxburghe was very devoted to Pauline Astor about three years ago but she did not give him any encouragement. It was just eight summers ago, at this time, that Mrs. Ollie Belmont, who was then Mrs. Alva Vanderbilt, imported the Duke of Marlborough and gave him a series of entertainments which culminated in the announcement of his engagement with her daughter. A little later she married Ollie Belmont, and as Mrs. Goelet has been following her procedure it may be her intention to espouse a certain New York millionaire who has been very devoted to her.

Those Gay Hawaiian Princes

Matteo Sandona, the artist, has gone to Honolulu to paint the portrait of the Princess Kawananakoa. The day that announcement was made I received a letter from a correspondent in Honolulu informing me that the large fortune which the two princes, David Kawananakoa and Jonah Kunia Kalanianacle inherited from their aunt, the Queen Dowager Kapiolani, is in a badly tangled condition. The German Savings and Loan Society of this city recently notified the tenants of certain property belonging to the princes covered by a mortgage for three hundred thousand dollars to pay no more rent to any one except the agents of that corporation. This action was taken under a clause in the mortgage bestowing the power in the event of default in the payment of principal or interest. The Queen Dowager Kapiolani was a chiefess of high rank and was possessed of broad acres. She was also a thrifty soul. King Kalakaua may have had enough of the proverbial extravagance of the Hawaiian for both of them, but she never allowed him to be extravagant with her money. She inherited from her grandfather, the last King of Kanai, land on every island of the Hawaiian group. About two years before her death, which occurred six years ago, she conveyed to her nephews, the two princes, all her land, reserving for herself out of the income twelve thousand dollars a year for life. When she died she confirmed this gift to them by her will, and bequeathed in addition all her personal property. The princes then organized the "Kapiolani Estate Company, Limited," and turned the management of it over to J. F. Colburn, a very shrewd half-white.

An Unsuccessful Enterprise

While Colburn managed the estates the princes spent money with lavish hands. Prince Kalanianacle and his wife took a trip around the world and made a great splurge en route. During the trip he acquired a menagerie large enough to serve as the nucleus of a circus. The animals accompanied him on the trip and the menagerie was therefore a very expensive luxury. Prince David remained at home and took an interest in politics. When the craze for big buildings struck Honolulu the princes decided to erect one, and for that purpose they mortgaged nearly all their land to raise sufficient money. They gave their note for six years, and this year they failed to pay the interest. The big building is finished but it is occupied only by the manager of the estate and two or three other individuals. Meanwhile the princes have had to curtail expenses, and the wife of Prince David, who was Abigail Campbell, daughter of

The "Girls" Scared Her Away

Mrs. "Gus" Costigan is a bride of recent date and she is already experiencing the troubles of brides as they are told us in the funny columns. The other day she visited a Sutter street intelligence office to engage a maid-servant for her new home. One by one the "hired girls" passed in review, and the pretty little bride's brow wrinkled with the effort of selection. Suddenly she turned to the head of the office, with a wave of her hand toward the assembled applicants: "Oh," she exclaimed, "I don't know which one of them I want. You select one for me," and then ran down the stairs as if the whole bunch were in pursuit.

The Experience of Another

Another young bride of a few months, who is noted for her haughty demeanor and who is therefore not very popular, had a very unpleasant experience in an intelligence office not long ago. She too was in quest of a maid-servant, and a buxom young Irish woman was recommended. The bride proceeded to tell the woman what services she would be required to render, and it took her quite awhile to enumerate them all. Her hauteur evidently aroused the displeasure of the Irish woman, for when the bride finished the Abigail proceeded to catechise her in a somewhat insolent tone and in the presence of about a score of women who were seeking employment, all of whom apparently regarded their companion as a great wit.

"Ar-re you th' lady iv th' house?" she asked.

"Yes, I am," was the reply.

"An' it's you that wants th' survint?"

"Yes."

"Do you give her th' ordhers?"

"Yes."

"Then I don't think I want the job," she drawled, and the bride blushed.

Symphony Discords

The symphony concerts have produced the usual number of rows. Musicians never could live in harmony. To begin with the Italians and the Germans are at loggerheads over the merits of Mascagni and Scheel. The Italians say that the two men cannot be compared and the Germans admit ironically that that is quite true. Little Pietro Marino, with his lovely, waving, poetic hair, is not in the orchestra this year. He was engaged, but he didn't fiddle to suit Scheel. The latter made a few suggestions to him and the little Italian grew indignant. He fiddled to suit Mascagni, and he wouldn't take a suggestion from Scheel. So he went home with his little fiddle under his arm. Scheel is very much stouter than he was when last here and he looks prosperous. Perhaps the commercial atmosphere of America has affected his artistic temperament and sharpened his business eye without dulling his musical ear. If so, his admirers could present him with another laurel wreath without fear of his pawning the golden token.

The American Land and Trust Co., of which C. W. Wright is president, has removed its offices to 708 Market street, Mutual Savings Bank building. This company is the owner of Larkspur, which is now the most sought after residence district in Marin county.

Clever Artist Gone

Harry Raleigh, the clever young artist who made the cartoon for the last low jinks of the Bohemian Club, has gone to New York to open a studio and devote himself to magazine illustration. Raleigh is one of the most talented of the younger artists who have recently come to the front in this city. He has done some very striking landscapes that are refreshing in their boldness and their individuality. For several years Raleigh has been connected with the Examiner's art department. And by the way, I am reminded that the newspaper artists of this city are preparing for an exhibition of their pictures. There has lately developed a great demand for their original drawings made for newspaper reproduction. The wash drawings are especially valuable since they are akin to the regulation water color. The walls of the Family Club are covered with the original drawings of Opper, Davenport, Edgren, Igoe and other noted newspaper artists, and in some private residences there are some splendid specimens of the modern art of illustration. Mrs. Charlie Baldwin (Ella Hobart) has a collection of black and white drawings including original Gibsons, Wenzells, etc., that cannot be duplicated in the United States.

Stanford May Abandon Co-Education

Every little while something is done at Stanford University to jar the academic world. It would be hard to predict just what is going to happen next, but from an authoritative source I learn that there is a jolt in store for the advocates of co-education. The question of the advisability of excluding the gentle sex from the penumbra of the lamp of knowledge at Palo Alto has been under serious discussion among the trustees of the university, and they are expected to arrive at a decision in the near future. This news comes to me from a source with which Mrs. Stanford is in such constant touch that I am constrained to give it credence. Just before leaving for her trip around the world, last June, Mrs. Stanford told the trustees that the question was one for them to decide, and she hoped they would reach a decision at an early date. It is known that she has never warmly approved of co-education. The university was dedicated to the memory of her son, and she thought that it should be devoted to the education of men. It has been remarked that though she frequently referred to the students as "my boys," she never spoke of "my girls." She built for the young men a permanent dormitory, and is now building for them one of the finest gymnasiums in the country. The young women are still occupying Roble Hall, a temporary frame structure. These are circumstances that are regarded as significant.

Jordan a Partisan

When Stanford University was opened co-education was favored as an experiment only, and that was why no permanent provision was made for the skirted sex. Now the trustees are called upon to decide whether the experiment has been a success. President Jordan is an ardent supporter of co-education, and he will no doubt try to influence the trustees in its favor. But S. F. Lieb, the ex-president of the trustees and Mrs. Stanford's attorney, is opposed to the present system. Mrs. Stanford's brother, Charles G. Lathrop, who is treasurer of the institution, agrees with Mr. Lieb, and both exercise a powerful influence in the board. Down at Palo Alto there is scarcely any doubt that the decision will be against the present system. It is presumed that the trustees will settle the matter by refusing to permit any more women to enter, and agreeing that those already entered shall be permitted to complete their course. The male students are unanimously opposed to co-education. They think that it lowers the standard of the university, and that the institution can never attain the high position occupied by Yale and Harvard while women are admitted. Knowing that Berkeley as a State institution will always have to provide for the education of women, they feel that Stanford will receive new impetus by the exclusion of the co-eds.

Talent Recruited From Abroad

Local academicians are greatly amused over what they regard as Berkeley's patent pretensions in undertaking to produce Racine's masterpiece, "Phedre." The purpose of the production is to exploit the attainments of the French scholars, but the leading role, Rachel's part, is to be played by Grace Llewellyn Jones, who learned her French in Paris where she lived for years. She never attended Berkeley but to give verisimilitude to the pretensions of the faculty she is to be entered as a post-graduate. The burden of the play will of course be on her shoulders, which is no doubt fortunate for the other members of the cast, who learned their French from Professor Paget.

"I see that Rockefeller was again conscience-stricken the other day."

"How do you know that he was?"

"He gave some more money to Professor Harper's university."

Well Pedigreed and Endowed Buds

Most of the buds who will bloom this winter in society are gifted with lineage above the average. They have so many relatives that they are sure to be entertained right and left. There are two Christines among the prospective debutantes—Christine Pomeroy and Marie Christine de Guigne. The latter would have been among last winter's debutantes but for family affliction. She is the granddaughter of Mrs. Abby M. Parrott. Her mother, Minnie Parrott, was that lady's eldest daughter. With her sister, and her cousin, the daughter of Joseph Donohoe, also a granddaughter of Mrs. Parrott's, all coming out together, it is safe to assume that the large connection of both the Parrott and the Donohoe families will do a lot of entertaining. Not a little curiosity is felt regarding a second pair of cousins who will grace the debutante circle this winter. They are the daughters of Mrs. Wilfred Page and Mrs. George Page. The mothers of both young ladies were noted as beauties in their day, Mrs. George Page as Georgie Hammond and Mrs. Wilfred Page as Emma Adams. Both families have made their homes in the country for many years, and the buds are therefore comparatively unknown in our social world.

Doctors' Daughters to Debut

Another pair of cousins among the coming buds are Elsie Dorr and Florence Gibbons. Elsie is the daughter of Dr. Dorr. She is petite in figure with a most vivacious manner. Miss Gibbons is the third daughter of Dr. Henry Gibbons and is by some considered the handsomest of that handsome family. She is tall and willowy, blonde in coloring, resembling her eldest sister Ida. Her second sister, Marjorie, is a sparkling brunette. Helen Bowie, another of the buds who will bloom, is a petite brunette. She is the daughter of Dr. Hamilton Bowie of Redwood City, a niece of Allan St. John Bowie and granddaughter of Mrs. Louise Barroilhet, who not long since inherited a large estate from the late Charles Mayne, an early day pioneer merchant of San Francisco. Mrs. Charles Josselyn will introduce her daughter Marjorie, who strongly resembles her sister Gertrude. They are nieces of Fred Greenwood.

McCalla's Practical Test

Captain McCalla, commandant of the Navy Yard at Mare Island, is said to represent in the military world just about what Roosevelt does in the political; he is "the disturbin' element." The story has been told of how the captain took off his military coat to afford a fighting opportunity to a disgruntled private who didn't dare hit his commanding officer. Well, the captain has been taking off his coat again, only, this time without bellicose intentions. Up at the Navy Yard the mechanics have been in the habit of quitting in time—in a trifle too much time to catch their evening boat. The captain being a bit inquisitive, decided to find out how much time was necessary for the men's ablutions and their walk. Consequently, when he suddenly appeared in the works one evening with his coat off, the men gathered about for what they thought was to be a little prize-fight. But just then the quitting time came and the captain turned on his heel and struck off at a brisk walk for the wash-room. He doused his hands and face in the water, rubbed them on the towel and putting on his coat started for the boat. When the men arrived, he had his watch on them. "Hereafter," he said sternly, "all mechanics will quit work eighteen minutes later." For a moment the men were dumbfounded; then one brave spirit spoke up. "Captain," he said, "you've been timing us."

"Yes," said the captain.

"You quit when we quit," said the man, "and you went to wash."

"Yes."

"But, Captain," urged the mechanic, "our hands were greasy with a whole day's work, and yours weren't even soiled."

His Quick Wash

Then it was the captain's turn to be staggered. "By Jove, you're right," he said, but the next night he was at it again, and when quitting time came, he was alternately rubbing his hands on the iron work and dipping them into grease pots. That evening he was again at the boat with his watch out. "Let me see your hands," he said to the former spokesman. The man turned up his palms. They were the hands of a mechanic—rough, but clean. The man hesitated a moment; then with a twinkle in his eye, "May I see your hands, captain?" he asked. Ruefully, the captain turned up his palms. They looked as if they had been dipped in oil and sprinkled with coal dust. "The difference in time," he began diffidently, "is not eighteen minutes, as I mentioned last night. According to tonight's corrections, it is fourteen minutes and a half. But"—and he glanced again at his hands—"I'm afraid the specifications of the wash-basin will be rejected by my immediate family." He turned on his heel. "Hereafter," he said, "all mechanics will quit when they please."

A Joke on Darling

For some time past, the United States trainingship Adams, which is lying in San Francisco harbor, has had for her navigator "the statistician of the Navy," Lieutenant Robert E. Coontz, better known in the service as "The Senator." Coontz earned his nickname from his remarkable familiarity with politics, national, state municipal and ward. His memory is something marvelous. I remember that years ago Coontz could answer, off hand, pretty nearly every question bearing on political elections of any kind. He could tell who led the Republican ticket in the 'Steenth Ward of St. Louis in 1879 as glibly as he could give the Democratic majority in any old county in 1884. Nor does his store of statistics end with politics. He could tell the age of every member of his class at Annapolis and knew the genealogy of the House of Hapsburg as well as he did his multiplication table. I am told that he remembers today the date of retirement of all his seniors and many of his juniors. "Senator" Coontz's memory stands him in good stead at all times, but it is related of him that his first question to the first man he met when emerging from his entrance examination at the Naval Academy was: "Where is Beyrout?" That is one of the questions often asked of the candidates for admission to the school, as it is a leading seaport of the Mediterranean. I was reminded of the incident by the joke that Charles Hial Darling, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, perpetrated upon himself when he cabled to Admiral Cotton, last week, "Vice-Consul at Beyrout reported assassinated. Proceed immediately nearest port. Report." He was doubtless as ignorant as "Senator" Coontz was twenty-two years ago that Beyrout is its own "nearest port."

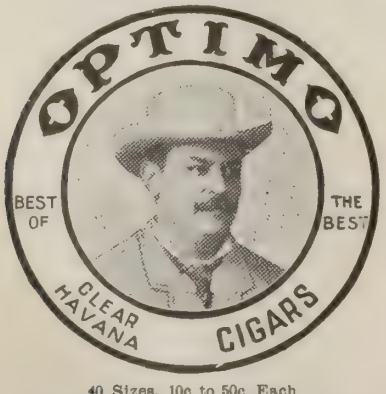
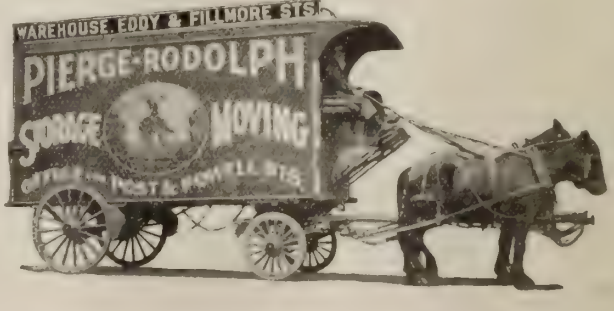
the Olympia, have been damaged by running upon rocks or shoals. It was Barker who commanded the Newark when that vessel ran into the Dolphin, on the north coast of Cuba, during the Spanish war. Barker, who has always had a tremendous pull, was never officially blamed for that mishap, notwithstanding the fact that he was on the bridge of the Newark, and therefore in charge of her when that vessel diverged from her course, approached and endeavored to cross the bows of the Dolphin, which never swerved from her course until the collision. By some official jugglery the blame was virtually passed up to the officers of the deck of the two vessels, both young junior lieutenants, although the one on the Dolphin strictly obeyed the rules of the road, and the one on the Newark was under the immediate supervision of Barker, who was on the bridge by his side throughout the manœuvre. Try as these young officers might to secure a court of inquiry to exonerate them, they were unable to do so. "Not in keeping with the best interests of the service," etc., were the excuses given from the Department for refusing them the inquiry which might have placed the blame upon the pull-possessing rank-holding Barker.

The Wild Ideas of Miles



General Nelson A. Miles thinks that cavalry are becoming obsolete and he recommends that automobiles be substituted for horses. This is quite in keeping with other of that spectacular warrior's fancies. It is true that he also recommended the construction of smooth roads for the automobiles to travel upon, but I have a vague suspicion that the enemy would not always stick to the road, nor would it take less than a few thousand years to construct roads enough for the automobile campaign in the hostile country. Miles has caused the expenditure of thousands of dollars of the nation's money in just such experiments as he suggests in his automobile theories. Fort Myer, Va., and other government reservations, are stacked up with piles of old, costly junk, monuments to some of his wild ideas. I recall, for instance, the scheme he had for supplying the army with a stock of armored shields on wheels, for the men on the skirmish line to shove ahead of them as they advanced on the foe. He actually had some of these built, and they performed beautifully—on paper and on a smooth asphaltum field. How useful they would be over fences, up hills, in bogs, rice-paddies, through woods, and in the other usual places of field operations, may be left to the imagination.

The Turk's Viewpoint



While the attempted assassination of an American Vice-Consul is something demanding immediate and energetic action on the part of our Government, we should not let our frenzy get the better of us to the extent of damning the entire Turkish people. Protection of diplomatic and consular officers is one of the fundamental requirements of international law among civilized peoples, but until the nation in which any crime upon a foreigner has been committed is guilty of dereliction, either in the prevention or the punishment of such crimes, it is presumptuous to clamor for that nation's disruption. The murderous acts of individuals are always liable to occur. They occur in our own country, but, should a Turk be murdered in San Francisco, it is not necessarily a casus belli. There is something to be said on behalf of the Turk. If Americans go to Turkey to live, they must conform to Turkish laws, and this is precisely what a great many of them do not do. There was much truth and hard sense in a recent statement given to the press by Chekib Bey, Turkish Minister to Washington. "I am advised," said he, "that certain missionaries, when they go to Turkey, are constantly arousing the Armenians against the Moslems. They even talk to the Armenians about exterminating us. Is that not inciting the Armenians to rebellion? Suppose I should establish a school for negroes in Washington, and my teachers should tell the negroes attending that school that they ought not to submit to lynching and should rebel. Do you think I would remain long in this country, or that my school would flourish? It is merely justice that when the missionary comes to Turkey he should confine himself to the religious and intellectual training of his pupils, and not endeavor to make them dissatisfied with their present form of government."

Frank Mrs. Black

Mrs. Black, the wife of the Commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, is a clever woman. She is a Bostonian of good family, and a woman whom travel and several winters of official life in Washington have broadened and cultured. She told some good stories at a Presidio luncheon in her honor the other day—stories which would make the W. C. T. U. women sit up and take notice. Mrs. Black will never be elected president of a temperance organization, nor does she aspire to that honor. Her hostess at the Presidio luncheon asked, "Well, Mrs. Black, have you enjoyed your stay here?"

"Most decidedly I have," said the frank lady. "We got what we came for, and that always adds to one's enjoyment of a place."

A Few of Her Stories

But that was only a prelude. During the progress of the luncheon Mrs. Black said: "During the great war some one sent to a prisoner in one of the Southern prisons a bottle of brandied peaches and in his note of thanks the soldier said, 'I not only enjoyed your peaches but I appreciated the spirit in which they were sent.'" She spoke of the wineless days of the Hayes Administration, telling of the poor, thirsty diplomats who, condemned to cold water throughout the deadly long and dry White House dinners, used to call the Roman punch which, even under Mrs. Hayes, came after the roast, the "life-saving station." Another prohibition story which she related was of a man who had never tasted liquor but who, on partaking of some Roman punch, passed his glass back for more of "that fine custard." She also related the familiar story of the preacher who, on tasting brandied peaches for the first time, passed his plate back with the remark that he didn't care for any more peaches, but he would like "some more of the juice."

Service Gossip

Lieutenant "Phil" Andrews, of the Navy, is rejoicing over the birth of a fine son. Mrs. Andrews was formerly a belle of Honolulu. The lieutenant is now here on a brief leave of absence from his duties as flag-lieutenant on the staff of Rear-Admiral Henry Glass, commanding the Pacific squadron, and will rejoin the New York upon her arrival here in a few days.

Army circles here are preparing to give welcome to the latest bride. The marriage of Captain Arthur Conklin of the Coast Artillery and Miss Eleanor McCasky, eldest daughter of Colonel W. S. McCasky, took place on Wednesday last at Fort Sheridan, where the bride's father is in command. It was an al fresco ceremony, performed on the lawn by the Reverend Frank Millspaugh of Topeka. Army people are known to be exceedingly hospitable, and no doubt San Franciscans will soon have an opportunity of viewing the handsome silver service that was presented the bride by the officers and ladies at Fort Sheridan. Two of the officers of the Seventh Infantry who expected to go to the Philippines are not, it seems, to sail on October first. One is Lieutenant-Colonel T. C. Woodbury, who has been transferred to the Thirteenth Infantry and will probably remain at the Presidio, although his predecessor, Colonel Duncan, was quartered at Angel Island. The other is Major J. M. T. Partello, who has exchanged with Major Wright of the Fifteenth Infantry, and with his family will soon leave for Monterey where his new regiment is stationed. Captain F. A. Millar, Artillery Corps, left last Monday for Washington, D. C., where he will be attached to the staff of General Wallace Randolph, chief of the Artillery branch of the service. Major Charles W. Hobbs has been ordered from the Presidio to Jackson Barracks near New Orleans. Captain F. H. Hardie, Fourteenth Cavalry, who sailed for Manila on the transport Thomas last Tuesday, was guest of honor at a stag dinner given by Captain Parker W. West last Monday evening.

"Reggie" Nicholson made a flying visit to this city last week, and it was all too short for his friends, as well as for the family of his wife, whom he visited while here. It was Commander Nicholson who rendered brilliant service as navigator of the battleship Oregon during her notable trip around the Horn. Coming from an old naval family, "Reggie" has inherited the best traditions of the service. It is truly said of naval officers, that "some of them make the Navy, others are made by it." Nicholson belongs to the former class, the class that preserves the high principles and ideals of the service. He now holds the important position in the Navy Department at Washington of assistant to the Chief of Bureau of Navigation and Office of Detail. It is his duty to detail the officers of lower rank than himself to their stations as required.

Uncle George Chases a Car

"Uncle George" Bromley, aged eighty-seven, was observed the other day madly chasing a car up Clay street. Two wags watching him were amazed at his agility and swiftness and were also amazed that he should put such a tax on his muscles at eighty-seven.

"Gee, I shouldn't think Uncle George would run after a car at his age," observed one Bohemian.

"Oh, well, when one is eighty-seven," said the other, "I suppose every minute counts."

Mr. Denis O'Sullivan will be heard once more in recital before his return to London. On Friday evening, September eleventh, at eight-fifteen o'clock, he will give a recital of some twenty-six songs of which one-half at least will be entirely new to his San Francisco audience. Mr. Fred Maurer will be the accompanist. Of a recent recital in London the Times says: "It is difficult after yesterday's success to assign him any position lower than one among the illustrious singers of the world. There is only one word to express the union of a technical perfection with the complete power of realizing every dramatic suggestion in the songs he sings and that word is genius."

My tearful tunes and morbid verse—
The red erotics I rehearse—

The Go-the-Pace-Space Letters

A "PUBLISH" OF TWO.

Being the very latest in epistolary literature, combining the raciest qualities of all the recently published correspondence of famous nonentities.

Letters from Jack Go-the-Pace, a clubman, to Mary Space, a literary lady of sporty tendencies.

I.

My dear Mr. Go-the-Pace,

I wonder if I shall ever see you again? If you are short-sighted, probably not. Was it you that rang up yesterday when I was out? My maid said "the gentleman would not leave any name, but he had a mighty nice voice." Have you "a mighty nice voice?" I confess I can't remember its dulcet tones very well, for we didn't talk much—after the first ten minutes. There seemed to be no time. I did not believe it could be you, because you said you were leaving for San Francisco on the early train. A week is a long time. I'm sorry you'll be away that long—for I have a wretched memory for faces. I remember episodes; sometimes when they are especially pleasant, but identities are apt to get mixed. I am striving to fix your face in my memory, so I won't forget. What a pity it would be if I shouldn't remember you next time we meet. That would be a death-blow to sentiment, wouldn't it? Try and avoid the contingency by coming back to the Glen.

Sincerely. Mary.

II.

My dear Mary,

(I can't call you Miss Space, you know.) I regret exceedingly that circumstances over which I have no control prevent me from joining you in your retirement from the gay festivities of this wicked city. Poverty is tapping at my door. If you could see my purse which I clutch in the morning with a lonely nickel sliding from end to end, and note the grasp of my fingers, you would not suggest my taking even a trip to the park. I wish to confess that I might pawn my watch and come—only that is already in repose. You know, dear Mary, that man cannot live on love alone, nor woman either when she has the cocktail habit. Write to me every day. All that about forgetting makes me long for you the more. But when, my dear, are you going to tell me the great secret about yourself? You said, I remember, "I am afraid you won't love me any more when you know." Know what? Are you married, Mary? Do you belong to another?

Your expectant Go-the-Pace.

III.

Dearest,

No, I am not married, but I feel sure you are. I know fate intended love's path for me to be covered with rocks—not the right kind of rocks, either. I am a fatalist. If—and if—and if—if I had not been on the boat at that precise moment, and if I had not dropped my purse, and if you had not picked it up! It was love at first sight, wasn't it, darling? I never in my life spoke to a strange man before—unless the butcher or baker or candlestick maker. But you did not seem like a stranger. I feel sure you are married, though—all the nice men, I have found, are. Is your wife en rapport? It must be positively painful for a man of intellect to have to look on and see his wife make a fool of herself. I suppose it is the penalty they pay for marrying them. Getting used to people is a pretty euphemism for forgetting them. You know Matthew Arnold's saying, "We forget because we must, and not because we will." I won't swear it is Arnold, for my memory is so poor. And that brings me to the old wail—I long for you passionately now but if you don't hurry I'm afraid I won't know you when we meet. Have you a short memory for faces? Mine is wretched. A man once said to me that if I married I'd have a fine excuse for my indiscretions, for I could tell my husband I forgot how he looked and mistook the other fellow for him.

Your devoted Mary.

IV.

Sweet Mary,

I cannot come to you but I love you just the same. I plead guilty to a few outings, but I always chose a ruddy-haired vis-a-vis, because of your dear Titian locks. A man can do that, you know, be true in heart though he has somebody else before his face. It's a delicate flattery, I think, to the object of his love. She is always in his mind when he's talking to the other woman. I suppose if I had married—I am not married, Maybell—propinquity would have kept my heart at home. It counts with all of us, but one can cultivate inconstancy. I think a good many men do the perfunctory love-making because tney think women expect it. Though the "good fellow girl" may be an unusual role women must be glad to play in it occasionally at least. It saves life from monotony and breaks no fences. I am glad, sweetheart, that no one ever kissed you but me. I like to think you are mine, all mine. Though sometimes I have a weak misgiving that you have deceived me, that you are married. By the way, dear, don't ask me if your letters bore me. I can read the national events in the newspapers, but no one but you can tell me of yourself. When are you going to reveal that dreadful secret?

Go-the-Pace.

V.

Darling,

If either of us ever cares to marry, we can marry each other. Arms and the man—arms and the woman; it's a try-out, isn't it? Pasts are nothing (to women of short memories); presents fill the bill; the future is only a guess. 'Tis a good thing to know there's always someone one can count upon to wed at a moment's notice. Saves the man the trouble—and expense—of extended wooing, and the woman the nervous strain of unnecessary wiles.

California sunlight, strong winds and alkali dust cause eye trouble. Little troubles grow, don't neglect them. Murine is a favorite toilet requisite, restores a faded eye to natural brilliancy, promotes growth of eyelashes, cures granulation and redness of lids, doesn't smart, soothes eye pain.

The laboratories of the Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago, are the largest in the world producing an exclusive line of eye remedies. Trade supplied by all jobbers.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS AND OPTICIANS

But you and I, love, must never marry. It would be the end of romance, and I am absurdly romantic. I feed on sentiment—except occasional heavier food. You are the same. You can't love one woman; the universe isn't sufficiently peopled with feminines to satisfy your mormon taste. By the way, you must tell me your secret. "You tell yours and I'll tell mine," as the children say. Let's both agree to write at the same time. That will be best.

Mary S.

P. S.—By the way, two lovely new men came to the Glen yesterday. One reminds me of you. I thought at first it was you—my memory for faces gets worse and worse.

P. S. No. 2.—Be sure and wear the same clothes when you come up, that you wore last, so I can be sure of not mistaking some one else for you. It was a light check suit, and a Panama hat, wasn't it? M.

VI.

Dear Mary,

Business is so pressing I've not been able to write before. However, I love you just the same. Give my regards to the "lovely man" who looks like me. I wish him luck in the chase. Will write what you want next Tuesday, by first mail, and shall expect you to reciprocate.

Y'rs, G. t. P.

VII.

My dear Mr. Go-the-Pace,

I told you you wouldn't love me any more when I tell you my Awful Secret. No, I'm not married; I'm not a divorcee; I'm not a widow. I am simply an Old Maid! Face creams, peroxide, and all the aids to beauty transformed me into a sweet young thing, and I thought you lots of fun—pour passer le temps. You don't mind, do you? I am wedded to my career and not looking for a change yet awhile. But how disgusting in you to deceive me—your letter is just at hand. A bachelor—a married man—all sentiment is woven about such. But a widower, twice over, with grown children! And one of your sons the "lovely man"! I really can't forgive you.

Cordially yours, Mary Space.

STAGE

Mrs. Harrison's Play

After seeing "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" one is inclined to doubt that Dave Belasco ever seriously set up the claim of joint-authorship. I am firmly convinced that Mrs. Burton Harrison wrote the play, and that Mr. Belasco rendered her no service until he boomed it by pleading guilty to having been implicated with her in its construction. The second act, presenting the scene in Central Park, is one that Dave Belasco with his deftness of touch and marvelous skill could no doubt render realistic. His success as a playwright has been largely due to his faculty for investing scenes of that sort with striking realism. But there is no evidence of the Belasco touch in the second act of "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch." The whole act is a bald and unconvincing narrative, lacking in finesse and verisimilitude. It is painfully artificial, and moves along in jolts that jar. The play is interesting only in that it depicts the intensity of maternal devotion, and the poignant grief of a woman who has been deprived of the company of her child. But it is unconvincing from the start. The meeting of the husband and his wife in the first act, the manner in which it was brought about, the stipulation entered into regarding the child, are all highly improbable in the play, dramatic though those episodes were in the story. The fact is that though Mrs. Harrison writes a fairly good story, she has not perfected herself in the handicraft of the playwright. Nevertheless she manages to develop her plot in a way that prepares her audience for the thrill that comes in the third act, with its "East Lynne" motif. This is the only act that gives opportunity for strong emotional acting. The bride-elect is displaying her wedding-gifts to the six prospective bridesmaids and then she tries on her wedding gown so that the modiste's assistant can place the finishing touches. There is a pretty little prelude where Gladys Lorimer talks sweet nothings over the 'phone to her fiance, the six friends meanwhile listening in amusement to the one-sided dialogue and afterward good-naturedly mocking it. There are other touches that suggest Clyde Fitch. The heart interest centres in the visit of Mrs. Hatch, disguised as the modiste's assistant, and her meeting with her daughter who does not know her mother is even in existence. Agnes, the old servant who managed this peep of her former mistress at her old home, hovers around nervously, fearing discovery. Mrs. Hatch struggles with the heart-hunger that bids her reveal her identity and clasp her daughter in her arms. She takes a few stitches in the lace on the bridal costume, then the needle falls from her grasp. She is on the verge of fainting twice, but each time recovers herself, the young girl being sweetly solicitous of the poor woman's condition and overwhelming her with kindness. The title role of the play is one that Florence Roberts plays with her usual enthusiasm, and she succeeds in arousing deep interest in her misfortune. Her temperament lends itself to the portrayal, and she is at times intensely emotional. She even triumphs over the shortcomings of the play to such an extent as to move her audience to tears. Her support is adequate but some of the members of the company do not appear to advantage. Mr. William Yerance as the lawyer is painfully ill at ease, and Mr. Howard Scott is far from satisfactory as the husband. A capital piece of character work is done by Marie Howe in the role of the Irish nurse.

Among the flowers Florence Roberts received on her opening night were many rare orchids. Such a showing of orchids has never before been seen here among the floral tributes to a star.

Florence Roberts to Interpret D'Annunzio

To the serious student of dramatic literature, as well as to the habitual theatregoer, Miss Florence Roberts's forthcoming matinees of D'Annunzio's "Gioconda" should be of absorbing interest. It is perhaps difficult to classify exactly D'Annunzio's position as a literary artist. To a degree he combines the realism of Emile Zola with the symbolism of Maeterlinck, and belongs to that group of writers who, taking their rise in France during the last quarter of a century, have become popularly known as the Decadents. "Gioconda" and "Francesca da Rimini," both produced originally by Duse, the great Italian actress, are D'Annunzio's chief contributions to the drama. In "Gioconda" he symbolizes, in a way, the tragic struggle between two powerful and opposing passions, the Love of Art and the Love of Home. But starting with this somewhat symbolic theme the development of the drama is on intensely natural lines. The characters are human and real, passion and emotion are skilfully blended, and the drama reaches its climax in a situation of startling and thrilling power. "To Eleonora Duse of the beautiful hands" is D'Annunzio's dedication of "Gioconda," and the heroine of the drama is a woman with hands as perfect as a sculptor's dream. This may not have influenced Miss Roberts's selection of the play, but she too has been gifted with a hand of rare symmetry, strong, nervous and expressive. The atmosphere of the play is that of modern Bohemianism, the chief scene being laid in a sculptor's studio in Italy. To add to the realism and effectiveness of this scene Miss Roberts has invoked the aid of Mr. Robert I. Aitken, the well-known California sculptor, whose models and drawings will insure artistic completeness of detail. Literature is a rare quality in the modern drama and Miss Roberts is to be congratulated on her enterprise in giving the first production in the West of this poetic and powerful play, while San Francisco audiences are equally to be congratulated on this opportunity to see and judge one of the latest products of a powerful and original dramatic genius.

The Morality Play

Into a materialistic and worldly age, whose goals are money and success, comes a breath from the middle ages, namely, the morality play of "Everyman." It is said to have been written in the latter half of the fifteenth century;—its spirit is older even than that. It is a Pilgrim's Progress, but a mediæval and Catholic one, and belongs to a time when the office of the drama was to inculcate reverence for the Church. When we read in cold print the old morality plays, with their personifications and abstractions, we dub them off-hand stupid and wooden, and we wonder how any audience even in that age of simplicity and piety could tolerate them. But to see "Everyman" performed by flesh and blood actors is to realize that the old moralities and mysteries were very live things after all, and must have gone straight home to the souls of the people. We hear much in our day of the stage as a teacher of morals, and much discussion centres around questions of the last new problem play. "Should we forgive her? Can we overlook her past?" How trivial and idle seem all such questions when face to face with the real problem of Everyman. The soul shall be called to her final reckoning and nothing but her own worthiness shall save her. That was how the older stage was a teacher of morals, and the lesson was like a hit straight from the shoulder. Then, too, we have run mad in our day over realism, scenery, and the personality of the actor. Is all our painstaking superfluous and unnecessary? Mr. Greet's stage had neither curtain nor footlights, neither orchestra nor change of scenery, and his players have no personality at all outside of their several parts. From the time when the two monkish apparitions glide out of the doors until the Doctor pronounces the lesson of the play the stage is never empty. The actors come and go among the audience, and the pilgrimage of Everyman and his attendants goes half-way around the auditorium, yet, far from being absurd, the effect is most intensely realistic. There is absolutely no pose, no affectation, nothing seems out of place or out of key. Grim and gristly Death, with his skeleton limbs and his grin, does not provoke a smile, and when Cousin says that he has a cramp in his toe we receive the statement like solemn gospel. The entire performance while unconventional is consistent, simple and moving. As to the acting, one hardly thinks of art at all, yet art there is and atmosphere. I do not know the name of the actress that played Everyman, but her rendition was instinct with life and feeling. In the first part of the play the interest was human. A young man in the full pride of life learns that he must die. As his worldly friends desert him, the theologic element comes in, and Everyman is resigned to the spiritual domination of the Church. The acting of the character demands a subtle combination of dramatic art and allegorical simplicity, for "Everyman," be it remembered, stands for all humanity, and his problem is the universal one. His bright and worldly spirit seems to age and grow gray as he yields his individual pride and will and from the rebellion of desire passes to the humility and obedience of religious faith. The costumes are said to be copies of fifteenth century Flemish tapestries. They certainly remind one of old prints and pictured windows. There is a stained-glass effect about them, a stiffness and richness of line, an iridescence of brocade and a sombreness of dull velvet such as the early painters loved for their saints and virgins. They gratify without distracting the eye. It was a wise arrangement, that of placing Adonai, or Deity, behind the scenes. Any visual representation might have conveyed a jarring impression and marred an otherwise flawless performance. As it was the lines were doubly impressive from the invisibility of the actor, coming as they did from some mysterious background. The audience was fashionable and late. It belonged on Wednesday night to the Channing Auxiliary and was a good turn-out. It listened intently during the hour and forty minutes of the performance, and did not even put in its hat-pins until the conclusion of the Doctor's exhortation. Old B'nai B'rith was newly swept and garnished and afforded a fresh and pleasing entourage. In color it is light and cheerful, and its method of illumination, from the ceiling, furnishes a soft, diffused radiance instead of the usual glare. Mr. Greet is especially anxious that "Everyman" be seen by students of schools and colleges on account of its great educational value. Special performances will accordingly be given for any such at reduced prices if application is made to Ben Greet, Lyric hall. As next Monday and Wednesday are legal holidays, the sale of seats will be transferred from Sherman and Clay's to the hall.

Margaret's Camille

The Miller revised version of "Camille" was received with enthusiasm last season, and is again packing the Columbia. Margaret Anglin's two thousand dollar gown has attracted many curious women, but if a gown were the only incentive the Emporium would afford a strong counter-attraction. This city is filled with "Camille" enthusiasts and Margaret Anglin satisfies their yearning, for her Marguerite is one of her greatest creations. Indeed her emotional work surpasses anything that she ever essayed in comedy drama. Henry Miller's Armand is somewhat out of drawing, but he acts the part with consummate skill. In the old days of Clara Morris we used to look upon Armand as the hero and the Count as a despicable creature. Now all that is reversed. Armand becomes a foolish boy, caddish even in his treatment of the woman who sacrificed so much for him. De Varville, on the contrary, takes his place as the gentleman of the world of clubs, the man who pays as he goes, forgives his bel ami when she entreats him, and is her champion when the young lover hurls insults at her in a public place. Nothing could indicate so clearly the trend of modern public opinion as this.

Italian opera is once more in full swing at the Tivoli, and the house has been crowded all the week with genuine music lovers. Several of the singers of last season's company were in the casts of "Aida" and "Lucia," which were given on alternate nights, and they were given very cordial receptions.

Miss Kemble's Artistry

In the Neill-Morosco company, at the California, there is an actress of rare personal charm who is not being rushed by society, but she has exceptional histrionic talent and an abundance of temperament, and though she is unknown on Broadway she is destined to arrive. I refer to Miss Lillian Kemble, who is doing brilliant work as a stock actress. This week she is playing in "Mrs. Dane's Defense" in the role admirably exploited in this city some years ago. At this particular time comparisons might be invidious, and therefore I shall make none, but Miss Kemble is surprisingly effective in the play. She is sufficiently emotional to accentuate all that Henry Arthur Jones sought to express, and during her passionate moments the reflection that she is merely acting never obtrudes itself. Therefore I consider Lillian Kemble an artist of considerable worth. Mr. MacVicars does excellent work in this production. His Sir Daniel Cartaret is worthy to place beside his fine Cardinal portraitures. Miss McAllister is especially good as the society tabby.

The Daly Melodrama

It was in "The Great Ruby" that both Marcia van Dresser and Blanche Bates made such hits with New York audiences, when they successively filled the role of the adventuress, that Ada Rehan's vanity was wounded. The part offers great possibilities to a clever actress. Genevieve Kane is the adventuress in the Central's production of the Daly melodrama, and she plays it with vigor and brilliancy. Mayall as Prince Kassim has a strong part that fits him well, and Miss Lawton does her usual finished work as Lady Garnett. Of course the role of Longman, chief of the diamond gang, falls to Henry Shumer, and of course he does full justice to it. There has never been Shumer's equal in a local stock company in the portrayal of villains' roles. With forty speaking parts this is easily the most ambitious production the Central has staged under its new management. "The Great Ruby" abounds in sensations, not the least of which are the race scene and the great battle for life in the balloon scene.

Clever Juveniles at the Grand

There are a few new children in the Pollard company, but for the most part the organization is the same as that which played such a successful engagement at the Tivoli a few seasons back. The bright principals are all there and it is hard to believe that they are really only children, so clever is their work. "The Belle of New York" abounds in music and comic situations, and the Salvation Army Lassie is as charming as ever. The little Pollards grasp the spirit of their lines and music in a most delightful manner. Among the new children are the McNamaras who are admirable additions to the company. But it is the Pollards, particularly the little comedian, who make the most pronounced hits. Of a theatrical family, bred to the stage almost from the cradle, these Pollard children seem to understand their parts by instinct. The costumes and staging are handsome and effective, and "The Belle of New York" goes well on the large stage of the Grand.

At the Orpheum

In spite of the fact that the other theatres are presenting bills of unusual interest this week the Orpheum does not seem to suffer at all by the competition. There is sufficient variety in the program to make it entertaining to every one. Among the newcomers are some of the cleverest people in the profession. T. Nelson Downs, King of Coins, a gentleman of distinguished appearance and suave manner, manipulates coins and cards in a way that completely mystifies the audience. Lew Bloom does the best hobo impersonation seen here in many a day. The two Levines, in their skit "My Eccentric Friend," tumble about the stage in a most reckless manner and added to these vaudevillians par excellence are Professor Schindler, who plays the most difficult arias on the harmonica, and Marguerite and Hanley, sensational acrobats. Marguerite is a strenuous lady with a powerful left arm, and though Hanley is an athlete of considerable cleverness Marguerite handles him as though we were an Indian club.

Tyndall's Sunday Nights

Those who know something of the facts of thought-transmission, and also some who believe that all psychic manifestation is due to legerdemain, were out in force last Sunday evening to hear Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lecture on "How to Read Thought." Steinway hall was packed to the doors and those who had neglected to secure reserved seats in advance were unable to gain admission, so great was the attendance. Tyndall went into the principles underlying the phenomena of thought-transference, from a scientific standpoint. He gave it as his opinion that the present manifestation of the phenomena is but the beginning of what may be expected in this line. He gave some interesting and valuable hints for the development of the faculty of receiving thought-vibrations, and modestly disclaimed any special or supernatural power. Tomorrow night Tyndall will again entertain with experiments in the power of thought, while the lecture preceding the demonstrations will, by invitation of the famous telepathist, be given by Dr. Albert J. Atkins, whose recent discovery that it is not oxygen that gives life has been heralded all over the world. What this vital spark is, and how he discovered it, will be the subject of Dr. Atkins's remarks. The coming Sunday night, September thirteenth, Tyndall will talk on "Divorce: Its relation to Psychology."

Features of Next Week's Bills

The Tivoli will have "Faust" and "Rigoletto" as its bill, the former on Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings and the latter on alternating dates. Tina de Spada, who was such a favorite last season, will sing Marguerite and Agostini will be Faust. Zanini will be Valentine and Dado Mephisto. A new face will be seen as Siebel, Eugenie Barker, an American girl, recently with the Carl Rosa company in London. Miss Deglow, a clever contralto, will sing Martha. In "Rigoletto" Alfredo Tedeschi will make his debut before an American audience. He is said to be the youngest tenor on the operatic stage of today. Gregoretti will be the jester and Travaglini the gypsy. Adelina Tromben will sing Gilda and Cleo. Marchesini will be the gypsy girl. Special new scenery has been prepared for both productions.

There has been a change in the arrangements for the remainder of the Miller-Anglin season at the Columbia and a rearrangement of bills is announced. It was the original intention to offer a repertory for the fifth and final week, but as the demand for "The Devil's Disciple" and "The Taming of Helen" has been so great, the two plays will be offered during the week commencing next Monday night. "The Devil's Disciple" will be seen on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights and at the matinee on Wednesday. On Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights "The Taming of Helen" will be staged for the last times.

Frederic Bond, the legitimate actor, will make his first vaudeville appearance in this city at the Orpheum in a brand new sketch, "My Awful Dad." The order of human nature is reversed in it so that the son looks after his father, who at fifty has not stopped sowing his wild oats. Almont and Dumont, the "instrumental hussars," will be heard on saxophones, cornets, trumpets, coaching horns and all kinds of wind instruments, and in costumes as striking as their music. Fischer and Wacker, comic Tyrolean duetists, imported direct from Berlin by the Orpheum Circuit Company, will make their first appearance in America. They have been a feature in the Wintergarten for several seasons and promise an act utterly out of the ordinary.

Tomorrow night the Neill-Morosco company begins its farewell week at the California, after seven weeks of exceptional success. The farewell offering will be "Notre Dame," a dramatization by Paul Potter of Victor Hugo's "Hunchback of Notre Dame." This enjoyed a big run last season at Daly's theatre, New York. The story deals with the love of a beautiful gypsy girl for a King's archer and the unfailing devotion of a hunchback who saves her from the fury of an angry mob who have accused the girl of being a witch and a sorceress. She finally dies at the burning stake just as her lover arrives with a pardon from the King. Thursday night closes the engagement in order to allow the company time to reach Portland for Sunday night. The regular "bargain" matinee will be given on Thursday as usual. Following come George Barnum and Alice Johnston in the new farce, "A Friend of the Family."

At the Grand the little Pollards will appear in that jolly military musical comedy "A Gaiety Girl," and everybody will be humming "Tommy Atkins" again. There will be extra matinees next Monday and Wednesday. These opportunities will doubtless be largely availed of by children. It should, however, be distinctly understood that this entertainment is not exclusively contrived for juveniles. It is even more captivating to adults.

"Whose Baby are You?" the Central's bill, is as full of ludicrous complications as the understanding will permit. The time of the first act is morning; the second, noon; the third, night; and in this short period the excitement over the mistaken identity of a baby rises to fever heat, causes tears, agony, wailing and gnashing of teeth, and then the excitement gives place suddenly to the extreme of mirth over the discovery of the error.

"The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" will be the Alcazar's bill, as the demand for seats is great. On the afternoon of September tenth Florence Roberts gives the first of a series of Thursday matinee performances of D'Annunzio's poetic and passionate "La Gioconda," a dramatic event of the highest value. We all know how Duse, in her infatuation for the morbid Italian author, refused to appear in any play save the product of his pen. Her "La Gioconda" gave New York a distinct nervous shock. But Florence Roberts will provide the first rendition by an American actress and in the English language. The art souvenirs to be bestowed are beautiful. "Magda" will follow.

"My Cocoanut Girl," 'sung by Winfield Blake, "My Pauline," Maud Amber, "Who's Your Lady Friend?" by Eleanor Jenkins, "McIlhenny's Cake Walk" by Harry Hermsen, "It Was the Dutch," by Kolb, Dill and Bernard, "Honey send home for more money" by Hope, Emerson and the chorus, and "Honey, will you miss me when I'm gone," by the quartet, will be among the new songs to be rendered in the next big double bill at Fischer's, which goes on next Monday night. It includes a funny travesty on "The Conquerors," called "The Con-Querors" and a new burlesque on the order of "Twirly Whirly" called "The Glad Hand," a conglomeration of selections and novelties from a lot of the Weber & Field's plays. There will be the usual original specialties and new features galore. The action of "The Con-Querors" takes place at Ingleside and on Telegraph Hill and not only is the entire cast in this play, but the chorus has been augmented to forty singers and dancers. There will be a special matinee on Admission Day. Following this production will come "The Paraders" which will have its first presentation here.

The Leandro brothers, comedy acrobats, will reappear at the Chutes. George Austin, the comedy wire walker, will continue, the Olson brothers, "Banjo Kings," will change their selections and Spaulding, "the man with the cuff," will vary his eccentricities. Lorain and Howell, "the elastic swells," promise many novelties and May Williams, contralto, will be heard in illustrated songs for the first time in this city. There will be special features on the two holidays. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Masterly Scheel

If Mr. Scheel is not having a good time here, it is not because of any lack of appreciation on the part of the music-lovers of San Francisco. Every bit of applause he received last Tuesday he earned as a musician and a leader of musicians: there was no hysterical glove-splitting due to breadth of back or witching magnetism of hand-over-heart bow; nor was the program cheaply popular. It opened well with a "Symphonie Dance" by Greig. It is not for me to decide whether the reading of the "Symphonie in E flat major" was such as would meet with the approval of the noble shade of "Mozart the eternal," but I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Scheel made of it music, delicate, beautiful, joy-giving. The "Fantasy from the 'Rheingold' and 'Gotterdamerung,'" arranged by Cyril Kistler, might, as it seems to my ear, be "remolded nearer to the heart's desire"; but the Schubert! The unfinished "Symphonie in B minor" is, as all the world knows, music for all time, music that leaves the soul exquisitely unsatisfied, dreaming of endings such as never mortal man composed. This Fritz Scheel knows, feels, expresses. The result is art. What more can one say? We are happy in having with us a leader who is en rapport with his music, and men who are en rapport with their leader. Once or twice, it is true, a wind, for instance, blew where it listed and one heard the sound thereof, but no one grudged the orchestra the praise passed on to it so generously by Mr. Fritz Scheel.

The program for next Tuesday's symphony concert will be interesting, and novel in many features. The numbers chosen are: Wagner, "Kaiser March"; Dvorak, symphony, "The New World"; G. F. Handel (first time), "Grand Concerto"; Hector Berlioz, "Damnation of Faust" (first time), "Dance of the Sylphs"; B. Godard (first time), "Ancients and Moderns," mazourka; A. Thomas, overture, "Mignon." The Scheel orchestra of seventy-five musicians will give two popular concerts, popular programs at popular prices, in the Mechanics' Pavilion next Monday (Labor Day) and Wednesday (Admission Day). The public will thus have a chance to hear some good music at easy prices, and the attendance promises to be enormous at both concerts.

H. B. Pasmore gave the first musicale of the nineteenth year of active work in teaching singing at his studio last Friday evening. Those participating were Miss Anna Obermuller and Miss Julia Kinsey of Haywards, M. E. Scott of Stanford University, and Miss Rose Cafejean, Miss Elizabeth Sandman and Raymond Dean of San Francisco. Miss Obermuller, being the most advanced pupil, delighted the auditors, while Miss Sandman, Mr. Scott and Mr. Dean, all of whom sang for the first time, created a most favorable impression. Miss Cafejean and Miss Kinsey showed marked improvement. Dorothy Pasmore contributed to the enjoyment of the evening by playing David Popper's "Vito" and as an encore a gondolier song by Mendelssohn.

Miss Bertha Altenberg's musicale in Byron Mauzy's hall on Wednesday evening of last week was very largely attended, and the following program warmly applauded: Lucia di Lammermoor, Donizetti-Smith, Hannah and May Rohde; Polonaise No. 1, Lichner, Georgie Smith; Rondoletto, Burgmuller, Olga Nicholson; Tarantelle, Heller, Henrietta Rosenblum; Hunting Song, Spindler, Carrie Renz; Valse de Concert No. 2, Godard, Goldie Samuel; Dorothy, Smith, Ella Stade; L'Amethyste, Leduc, Willian Nicholson; A Happy Meeting, Sartorio, Anna Green and Victoria Steinbock; Valse de Concert No. 1, Wieniawski, Stella Crosthwaite; Rosen Fee, Dewitz, Flora Morris; Diavolina (etude), Bendel, Leah Cohn; Il Trovatore, Verdi-Dorn, Josephine Horn; Dreaming and Awakening, Oesten, Nell Harkins.

Fischer's theatre has a new orchestra leader to succeed Harry James. Robert Hood Bowers is a composer of note, having written many successful musical comedies and light operas. He is only twenty-six years of age and yet he already ranks among the big lights among American composers. He has directed the

The Repartee of Berlioz

Hector Berlioz was very quick at repartee. While in Vienna Prince Metternich said to him, "Is it not you who compose music for five hundred musicians?" "Not always, monseigneur," replied Berlioz, "I sometimes write for four hundred and fifty." After one of his concerts an admirer rushed up to him and seized his left hand, exclaiming, "I beg permission to grasp the hand that wrote the symphony of Romeo. You understand Shakespeare!" "Certainly," answered the musician, "but you are mistaken in the hand, I always write with this one." One evening while in company the conversation turned upon the discontent felt by every one for his condition. A clerk of the Ministry who was present was not at all dissatisfied with his. "I would rather be what I am," he remarked, "than anything else." "For my part," remarked Berlioz, "I am not like you. I would rather be anything than what you are."

As to Piano Practice

A Berlin physician has come to the rescue of a long-suffering public in declaring against piano practice for girls under sixteen. He produces statistics to prove that the piano, undertaken before that age, is the cause of innumerable nervous disorders, and unless amongst those who earn their living by the thankless task of teaching music to unmusical minds, there is little danger that any one will go to the trouble of proving him in the wrong. Practicing music is the greatest waste of energy ever devised. Not once in twenty times does the child take the slightest interest in the task of mastering what is set before it. Not only is there the natural disinclination to close application, but there is often a specific loathing, and many a parent who has made heroic sacrifices in order to provide Mary Jane with an "instrument" and pay for lessons, while her mother emancipated her from household tasks in the interest of her lily white hands, has had the mortification of discovering not only that his daughter made no progress in her music but that as soon as she reached the age to assert herself the piano lid was closed for good and all. There is no more reason why every girl should strum the piano than why every boy should study law. Some are as incapable of mastering music as they are of writing poetry. Why not let them alone? The nerve-racking din of the practicing hours is justified only by the ultimate perfection of the performance, and if the child is foredoomed to failure out of temperamental deficiency, it might as well be put into a treadmill. Music is not like reading and writing, a daily necessity. It is an accomplishment which the majority of people can enjoy as they do painting or sculpture, without any mangling attempts of their own. If irritability, ill temper and inattention are rated amongst nervous disorders, the German physician has proved his claim. If the effect on those who are compelled to hear, whether they listen or not, the endless banging of keys, in private houses, apartments, and hotels is taken into consideration, he has earned his right to stand on equality with the discoverer of the latest microbe.

Gerard Barton, the organist and composer of so many charming songs, will leave San Francisco soon to accept a position in Honolulu which guarantees him twenty-one hundred dollars a year and expenses.

Emma Calve is suffering from heart disease superinduced by popular flesh-reducing methods. She was too strenuous. She exercised violently and starved herself at the same time. She lost her flesh and also her health.

Mrs. E. S. Bonelli, who has been seriously ill from an operation for appendicitis, and was at one time at death's door, is slowly recovering.

Denis O'Sullivan will sing the offertory at St. Dominic's church tomorrow morning at the eleven o'clock mass.

Automobile Topics

It is always interesting to note the enduring qualities of an automobile. People generally are more or less inclined to be fearful of an investment in an automobile, as they do not believe it has the lasting or serviceable qualities necessary to take it over a long trip and back again. An unusually trying experience of a "White" touring car is just reported. Mr. Frank Albrecht, a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, has recently made a trip from that city to New York and back again. The Pittsburg Dispatch states that the car arrived, "travel-stained and requiring some attention here and there, but sound of body and limb as at the beginning of a journey of something like two thousand miles over some of the toughest roads encountered anywhere." A test like this is even more praiseworthy than the endurance contests where cars are handled by experienced men furnished by the makers of machines.

Mr. James B. Dill, the adviser and counselor of J. Pierpont Morgan, is an enthusiastic admirer of the "White" touring car. With his daughters he is making a trip from Boston to the Maine woods, and return, on a wager. Mr. Dill said before starting: "Nothing but a steam car could do the work, and that is why I have taken three steamers. A gasoline car could never climb those steep hills, but a steamer can do it as gracefully as a launch gliding over the water. With five or six hundred pounds of steam behind it those cars could climb the side of a house, almost. We shall stop in the Rangeley lakes district till the first of September, and when we return we will probably come another route. I am taking this trip to show that the best and most honest test for an automobile is not to run it over the macadam roads of New York city, or up the Hudson, or from New York to Boston, such as the manufacturers do, but to put them where they will have to stand work and show what they are good for."

The great advancement made in automobiling in California, and especially in San Francisco, is more noticeable every day, and the number of machines now being used and being sold is something phenomenal. During the past week three automobile men from the East were here and each one expressed surprise at the great enthusiasm being shown on this coast over the horseless carriages.

Mr. C. E. Linaker, formerly of this city but now of the Olds Motor Works Company and an automobile dealer of Detroit, returned to the coast last week after an absence of six months, and he was amazed at the growth of the automobile business during that period. He said that he thinks it will not be long before the automobile in San Francisco, and for that matter all over the state of California, will be on an equal footing with the vehicles driven by horses. Mr. Linaker says the automobile factories are scarcely able to meet the demand for machines all over the country. The Oldsmobile factory at Detroit turns out thirty-eight cars daily, the factory at Lansing, Michigan, turns out four dozen each day, and yet they are one thousand carriages behind in orders. Mr. Linaker brought with him a sample tonneau seat for the Olds runabout which takes this modern chariot out of the runabout class and puts it in a class with higher priced touring cars. He says that the long expected Oldsmobile delivery wagons and touring cars will be ready for shipment in about a month.

Mr. W. E. Wright, vice-president of the Knox Automobile Company of Springfield, Massachusetts, was several days with the coast representative, the National Automobile Company, last week. Mr. Richvine, manager of the Autocar Company of Vardmore, Pennsylvania, was also in California and like Mr. Wright the guest of the National Automobile Company. Both are enthused over the interest shown in automobiles on this coast.

A great number of machines have been sold by local automobile dealers during the past week or two. A week ago last Thursday the Pioneer Automobile Company received a carload of sixteen Oldsmobiles and four days later every one of these modern chariots had been sold. Last Tuesday another carload of twelve Oldsmobiles reached here and nine of them were immediately disposed of. Eight big Stevens Duryeas reached the Pioneer Automobile Company during the week. All of them had been ordered by individuals.

Mr. Ivan Treadwell recently purchased a new Packard car. Doctors Stinson and Kugeler have bought Cadillac automobiles. Mr. A. J. Dodge, a member of the Island Automobile Club, has added a Rambler car to his stable. Mr. Duncan McKinnon of Salinas last week added another auto to his possessions by purchasing a Franklin machine. Mr. P. George Gow of the Bohemian Club has ordered through the National Automobile Company a Knox double cylinder touring car. Dr. J. T. Jones of Grass Valley is one of the late converts to the ranks of physicians using automobiles. He spent several days in San Francisco last week and after looking at all makes of machines decided that the "White" Steam Stanhope was the best for his purpose, as the rough roads around Grass Valley require a substantial machine and one with sufficient power to take it over all sorts of hills.

While at the Pioneer Automobile Company's store the other day I noticed a big French car, a very expensive looking vehicle, being fixed up and put into commission. On inquiring I was told that this modern chariot from France was being put in shape for William Randolph Hearst, who is expected to arrive in San Francisco in the course of a week or so with intentions of touring the coast in his horseless carriage. A few recent tours are here noted. Ivan Treadwell made several trips to the garden city in his Packard last week. Mr. P. G. Gow and wife recently returned from a trip to Webber Lake in a Knox machine. Dr. and Mrs. Russell Cool went to Los Gatos in a Knox last week. Mr. Thomas H. B. Varney, wife and their son Walter and daughters Eva and Maud, left Thursday morning for Aetna Springs in an automobile. —The Chauffeur.

The Muse of Scheffauer

"Of Both Worlds" is the title of a book of poems by Herman Scheffauer. The dedication is, "To my good friend, Ambrose Bierce." Bierce, it will be remembered, was the one who first called attention to Scheffauer's merits as a writer of verse. The young poet, however, does not need to climb upon the shoulders of Bierce or any other, being well able to stand upon his own feet and be judged according to his own merits. The more or less fanciful imitations of Poe which hold a place in the volume, and which are said to have first called forth the admiration of the older writer, are far less significant than many of the other pieces which express the poet's own individuality. Mr. Scheffauer's work as a whole is characterized by boldness of thought and expression, an unusually good sense of rhythm, and not infrequently by those lightning flashes of phrase wherein a word is made to express what a volume could hardly detail. "The Song of the Slaughtered" is the opening poem of the volume. It was originally published in Lippincott's, and attracted no small amount of attention at the time. It shows many of the writer's most characteristic qualities, and proves that his fancy flies on no uncertain wing. "Pickett's Charge" is an unusually good lyric also inspired by the theme of battle and sudden death. While a spirit of pessimism lurks in the background of very many of the poems it rarely speaks forth in such a decided note as we hear in "The Night Bells of Noel." This poem first appeared in the last Christmas number of Town Talk, and has undergone some slight changes at the hand of the writer. The first line originally read, "Hear the grim bells in the steeples," and has not been strengthened by the change into "Hear the bells in all the steeples." Worthy of special attention are the verses entitled "Sea Change," "De Profundis," "Murad Ali unto Dalja," "Shagalon of the Pole," and "Hurkalem the Hunter." It will be seen that Mr. Scheffauer's muse can sing to more than one tune. Some of the shorter poems are veritable little daggers, polished like silver and sharpened to a stiletto point. "Complaint" is one of them, "Past and Present," "The Second Thought," "Manikin and Maidkin" are also good examples. Scheffauer is best when he is most himself and can well afford not to imitate Poe or anybody else. Many of the lines could be quoted, but as Mr. Scheffauer is well known to the readers of Town Talk quotation is unnecessary. The volume is well gotten up by A. M. Robertson of 126 Post street. It is bound in dark green ornamented with an elaborate cover design. Mr. Scheffauer, besides being a poet, is himself a very clever artist and designer, and I wonder if the cover was his own device.

San Francisco's Bohemia

Frances Charles has chosen San Francisco for the scene of her second novel, and Bohemia for its environment. The characters around whom the interest is chiefly centred are Jameson, a newspaper man, and Julian Joy, an artist, and if the story emphasizes any special theory, it is that there is nothing so futile as the effort to regulate the life of another. Jameson and Julian were each only sons, but with diametrically opposite environments. Jameson's mother died when he was a child, and his father, elegant and exquisite, shifted the responsibility of not only the child's subsistence but his own, upon the father of Julian Joy, who was a rugged, energetic and successful man, without any of the exterior graces. When the elder Joy died Julian was about fifteen years of age, and Jameson literally took the lad from his mother, bent on developing his artistic leanings. Jameson has a fatherly love for the lad and really does his best for him. It is at this point that Miss Charles begins her story. Nearly every incident of importance takes place in a terrace over in the North Beach direction, where Jameson and Julian remove in order to escape from the social whirl into which they have permitted themselves to be drawn. There is the usual—one might say the conventional—complication of the bad woman. Jameson, whose creed is that love is only a factor in development, and ambition the real, satisfactory passion, interferes to save Julian from Antonia Vlor, but in the sequel he might just as well have saved himself the trouble, for when later on he again "saves" his friend from Ludwiga Strong, from what he persuades himself is interest in the youth's career and a desire to see him become a great artist, and not merely the husband of a nice girl, but which is in reality a much more human motive, the desire to win the girl for himself, it results in bringing Antonia and Julian together where there is no one to head matters off. And then, after Jameson has interfered between Julian and Ludwiga, even to the extent of bringing about Julian's dismissal from his position in the art department of the newspaper; when he is morally satisfied that the girl is really in love with himself, he walks off and leaves her, to satisfy a Quixotic notion that, having deprived Julian of a possible hapiness, now he must not secure it for himself. There is a comedy courtship carried on betwen Deborah Murphy, the Irish girl, a teacher of the higher branches, and by far the best character in the book, and Alfons Strong, brother of Ludwiga, but one cannot but wish Deborah had had better fortune than to have drawn a comedy husband in the lottery of marriage. Considering that Mrs. O'Byrne, the landlady, was a Catholic; that "ould Casey," frequently referred to, was a member of the same church; that Deborah Murphy was a regular attendant at the services, and that the mother of the Strongs had been a Catholic up to the time of her elopement with Dr. Strong, it is surprising that every one refers to the "Romish" church, and even when there is occasion to mention St. Mary's hospital it, too, is the "Romish" hospital, a designation which I will make bold to claim was never heard outside of this book. Though a distinct advance in construction upon the author's first novel, "In the Country God Forgot," Miss Charles has yet much to learn of the art of novel writing. One cannot say that there is anything improbable in her story, for it is a part of probability that many improbable things will happen, but it is far from convincing. It does not impress one with the idea that the author herself believed in her tale. Though it ends with the peal of wedding bells and the implication that "they lived happily ever after," one cannot help casting forward a few years and seeing picturesque scandals and divorces looming up in the near future. The book is neither good nor bad. It leaves one with a hopeful expectation that the next effort of the author will be better. [From Little, Brown & Co., Boston.]—The Bookworm.

Positive Tragedies

In last week's Town Talk, that entertaining essayist and poetic philosopher, Mr. Harry Cowell, discoursed in his graceful way about "A Negative Tragedy," that of an attractive woman full of maternal instincts who failed to achieve her desires. Reading it I was reminded that life is full of tragedies—negative and positive. I thought of the tragedy of the Small Man and the Large Woman linked together by the bonds that are so often unholy. In the land of Somewhere lived this midget creature, a featherweight biped, with a mild blue eye and a retreating face. His wife was a large, muscular female, a naturally dominant personality who would have been a leader among men if she had been built that way. He was docile and even lethargic. She was aggressive and active. She was irritable and peremptory. He was nervously apologetic. I have watched them in public and shuddered to picture them in private. One day I heard them talk.

"My dear," he began timidly, "I beg your pardon but you are not quite—"

"Who wants your opinion, you little fool?" she muttered in a fierce aside, and her brow was corrugated as she turned to me again.

The little man subsided.

Of course it is easy for the little man to "call down" the bullying woman, but the poor little fool never suspects that liberty is within his reach. Surely that is a tragedy—a Positive Tragedy.

Then in the land of Everyday there lived the Widower who, in marrying a second time, takes unto himself a Girl young enough to have played the part of daughter to the Wife of his Youth. He lives to appreciate his first wife, which he never did during her life. His young wife is beautiful and high-spirited and she likes admiration. She enjoyed life immensely. He found himself attached to a butterfly whose one idea was to seek life's sunshine and scatter with her delicate wings the pollen of his fortune. Wasn't it a tragedy for him?

On a farm, far from the madding crowd, lived a Beautiful Girl. Educated beyond her station, refined and charming, in all the circle of farm-houses round about there lived no Mate for the Beautiful Girl. She could not satisfy herself with a Boor, no matter what his wealth. She could not yoke herself to a Clown however rich his heart in love. Doomed by fate to pass her life in such an environment, with her heart longing for the companionship of a kindred soul—is not that a Tragedy?

A School Girl of sixteen was married when fresh from her studies, and unlearned in life and lore, to a rich old man. She did not know what was the compact into which she had entered by her parents' wish until—well, the honeymoon (miscalled term) over, she understood a little. In a few years she understood better what she had lost, for she met her soul's mate. It was too late. She was a good woman, a faithful wife. When her husband died, she was too old for aught but to wish herself in the grave with him. Another Positive Tragedy!

Other People's Ideas

Our English cousins use "left off" for "cast off" as applied to second-hand garments. The following ad. recently appeared in a London paper: "Mr. and Mrs. Hardy have left off clothing of all kinds. They can be seen any day from three to six p. m."—Lippincott's.

"If men knew all that women think, they would be twenty times more audacious. If women knew what men think, they would be twenty times more coquettish."—A. Karr.

To travel, whatever we may say to the contrary, is one of the saddest pleasures in life; when you begin to feel yourself at home in some foreign land, it is because you have already begun to make it your country.—"Corinne," De Stael.

From "Anne Carmel," by Gwendolen Overton:

Nature does not love the past. She builds upon it and covers it up, absorbing it into always renewing life. It is only man who lots off as sacred ground the spot of a tragedy and commemorates it, who marks the lying places of dead bodies. Nature obliterates quickly the traces of the struggles for life and death and the uncounted numbers of her dead, little and great, leave no token. The pathway of man is marked with the mound and the cairn and the headstone; there is rarely a bone by the trail of the wild thing, rarely the tiny, fine, ant-swarming skeleton of a bird beneath the tree where thousands have sung. The dead of Nature buries her dead and life comes forth—a better sign of Faith and Hope than man can show, and a better charity.

There is always a sense of finality, of putting a definite line between the past and the future, when one destroys anything closely connected with a part of one's life.

There are many faiths and convictions that vanish when we bring them into the air of controversy and argument, like the genii of the fairy tales that, once freed from the bottle, melted away like nothing.

Most of us think at the time that we do well to sell the birthright of contentment for the red pottage of a short felicity—and it is not until later that there comes the bitter cry. (Jean.)

There are so many fashions of saying "Neither do I condemn thee," and most of them are more humiliating than to be stoned. (Anne.)

Talking down to a lower understanding is always much more exhausting than any amount of striving upward toward a higher plane.

Ruef's Strategy

Two years ago, when Eugene Schmitz was a candidate for Mayor, he had the support of a faction of the Republican party composed of disgruntled politicians and their followers. At the head of that faction was Abe Ruef, an adroit practical politician who is engaged in politics for revenue only. There was a strong bond of friendship between Schmitz and Ruef, and upon the election of the former his political sponsor became his mentor. Ruef has directed the policy of the Administration, and he is responsible for nearly all the suspicion and odium that has been cast upon it. Now Mayor Schmitz is a candidate for reelection but he is no longer identified with his thrifty friend Ruef. The latter has become one of the select coterie of bosses engaged in managing the affairs of the Republican party. Whatever odium is attached to Ruef as a political leader must now afflict the syndicate which was organized to nominate the Republican ticket. Moreover every man nominated on that ticket will be daubed with tar from the same brush with which Abraham Ruef was smeared. So after all Eugene Schmitz is not leading such a forlorn hope as some of the wise practical politicians imagine. Of course Mr. Ruef is still the confidential adviser and friend of Mayor Schmitz, but the public, which is so easily fooled, regards him as one of the Republican bosses, and will no doubt be led to believe during the campaign that Eugene Schmitz is divorced from the arch-schemer who has tuned the Executive fiddle during the last two years, and that he is free from all entangling alliance. If Schmitz were to receive the Republican nomination he would be much worse off than he will be in a three-cornered fight, for then people would be reminded of the fact that he was still the protege of Ruef, and besides he would lose the vote of a large element in the Republican party by which he is regarded as a political mountebank, not to mention that conservative commercial element which is opposed to labor unions. The vote thus alienated would naturally go to the Democratic candidate. As the candidate of the Union Labor party, Schmitz will receive a large share of the votes of the disgruntled in both the other parties, and he is therefore in a very happy position. Perhaps when the campaign is over it will occur to the Republican bosses that Mr. Ruef played a very shrewd game when he joined them to temporarily relieve Mr. Schmitz of a fatal burden.

The Futility of It

Grover Cleveland is very enthusiastic over Joseph Pulitzer's generous donation to found a Department of Journalism in Columbia University. "I see in its success," he writes, "the ultimate extinction of the vexatious antagonism between the hap-hazard conduct of newspapers, and a large section of the public, and the release of public men from annoyance against which it is now hard to defend themselves. The high standing and conscientious conduct of the press is one of the most important agencies for the preservation of the best elements of our national character, and one of the surest guarantees of our national integrity and perpetuity." It is unusual for Mr. Cleveland to have much to say without knowing, or at least, appearing to know what he is talking about. He assumes that a successful Department of Journalism would turn out men who would revolutionize the newspaper business; that they would conduct ideal newspapers devoted solely to the dissemination of honest and intelligent opinions. He appears to be unaware of the fact that the working journalist has absolutely nothing to do with the policy of the paper by which he is employed. Nowadays many of the leading newspapers are owned by millionaires who know nothing about the technique of journalism, and who conduct newspapers to subserve their own selfish interests. They do not care anything about the preservation of our national character or of our national integrity. They are more deeply interested in the promotion of private enterprises, both political and commercial. The salutary influence of a Department of Journalism could never reach them.

More Federal Frauds

If Mr. Roosevelt were as aggressive as he is strenuous, as eager to wipe out official corruption as he is to discourage race-suicide, what a record he would make! Scarcely a day passes without some new revelations of corruption in high places, and unfortunately there is no person in Washington with the necessary courage to prosecute the crooks. The latest revelations of fraud concern the Interior Department, and they indicate the existence of a startling amount of corruption. Swindling schemes have been carried on openly by high officials, and Mr. Hitchcock has been as complacent in the face of proofs of misdoing as was Postmaster-General Payne when the rotten condition of affairs in his department was first exposed. Surely it behooves Mr. Roosevelt to quit Oyster Bay and devote a little attention to the affairs of the Government at Washington. He is said to be reluctant to assume an aggressive attitude toward the men involved in the various frauds that have been brought to light, because some of them exercise great influence in the field of national politics. However it would be less dangerous to antagonize them than to arouse the distrust of the nation, and if the guilty are to be dealt with leniently because of their political pull, Mr. Roosevelt will find that discreet forbearance is not always good politics.

Clark's Objection

Senator Clark, when interviewed abroad, said that he objected to government ownership of railroads because it would increase the number of men employed by the Government, and render it more difficult to affect a change of Administration. That has been the serious objection for years to any increase in the field of governmental operations, to any combination of economic with political powers. Twenty-five years ago it was said that when the nation's service ceased to be partisan, through the operation of Civil Service, it would then be found practicable for the people of the United States and of the several States to do many things for themselves which were formerly left to a few individuals with the result of building up vast private fortunes out of which the community gets little or no good. Within the past twenty-five years Civil Service has become pretty general, but the political influence of Federal patronage is still great, and undoubtedly it would become much greater if all the railroads were operated under the direction of a department at Washington. However the cry for government ownership is becoming louder and more insistent every day, and the indications are that an economic revolution is impending. Indeed it has already begun. Many enterprises that, a few years ago, were carried on by individuals, are now controlled by the community for its benefit, and the reformers, the workingmen, the anti-monopolists and the socialists who are all in favor of extending the scope of government ownership, are showing more and more political strength. But there is no occasion for alarm. There is nothing in the most revolutionary social programs that can seem to us much wilder than the political axioms of our forefathers seemed to the subjects of kings who ruled by divine right. The political republic is not anarchy and an industrial republic will not be chaos. Let the reformers and the socialists have their say. The advisability of letting them have their way is another matter, and it will be determined at the proper time.

A Professor's Prescription

There is something in the atmosphere of the University of Chicago which has the same effect as absinthe upon the mind. It unduly stimulates the imagination and causes a temporary aberration during which the victim is inclined to become oracular and give expression to opinions that are syptomatic of great mental excitement. Consequently some very queer and ridiculous sentiments have emanated from that university, and its professors have contributed quite frequently to the gayety of nations. It appears to be impossible for them to become acclimated, though they do enjoy lucid intervals, and it takes but a short time for a stranger to feel the effects of the bracing atmosphere. The other day Mr. John Quincy Adams, of the University of Pennsylvania, lectured at the Chicago University on the labor problem, and he explained that to solve it "we must make labor more interesting. We must give the laborer something to relieve the monotony." Then he went on to suggest that "the walls of working rooms in factories should be adorned with oil paintings by the masters; the hallways should be lined with statuary, the masterpieces of the great sculptors; and the manufacturing company should provide a band or orchestra to furnish music for its employes while they toil." Professor Adams was of course intoxicated by that same treacherous ozone that has played havoc with the minds of so many Chicago pedagogues. He was in a blissful state of unreason. His fancy was taking poetical flights, and he was unconsciously idealizing the laborer, and picturing him as an esthete yearning for soul-food, and sighing for the raptures of dreamland and the rose-tinted diversions of the idyllic art-lover. Professor Adams's suggestions are not likely to appeal the employers of labor in this golden age of industrial turmoil. If the labor problem cannot be solved except by adding an art gallery and a symphony orchestra to every manufacturer's plant we are destined to an eternity of strikes, boycotts and walking delegates.

Dr. Briggs on Change of Name

There is an article of considerable significance from the pen of Dr. C. A. Briggs, of the Union Theological Seminary, in The American Journal of Theology. It is significant of the trend of that noted divine's thought, and may give rise to speculation as to whether he is contemplating a change of religion once more. The article is a discussion of the proposition of the Episcopalians to adopt the name "Catholic." He contends that the name "Catholic" always stood for three essential things: the vital unity of the Church in Christ, the geographical unity of the Church extending throughout the world, and the historical unity of the Church in Apostolic tradition. He contends that those who would have a just claim to the title must possess the triple unity. During the course of his article he states that "It is mere perversity not to return to Rome if the conscience is convinced that Rome is right in all her great controversies with Protestantism." This statement has reference to the Ritualists. He also says, "There can be no doubt that the Roman Catholic Church of our day is the heir by unbroken descent to the Roman Catholic Church of the second century, and that it is justified in using the name 'Catholic' as the name of the Church, as well as the name 'Roman,'" and he adds, "If we would be Catholic, we cannot become Catholic by merely calling ourselves by that name. Unless a name corresponds with the thing it is a sham and a shame." This is pretty strong language, and the argument is not easily answered.

Disorganized Labor

Organized Labor was in a badly disorganized condition last Monday. It paraded to show its strength, but it only exhibited its weakness. In union there is strength and division bespeaks impotency. Organized Labor was divided last Monday. It made a public exhibition of the disintegration that has set in, of the worm of discord that is gnawing at its vitals. It could not unite for a single day and for the purpose of impressing the public with its strength. The unions were numerically strong, but they did not parade in harmony. In consequence of the jealousies of the union leaders the public was treated to the spectacle of two processions of the sons of toil moving in opposite directions. One procession was conducted under the auspices of the Labor Council and its most conspicuous feature was the Mayor of the city, representing the Musicians' Union. The Teamsters' Union belongs to the Council but it was not represented in the parade, owing to the political differences existing between Michael Casey and Mayor Schmitz. Andrew Furuseth and his powerful water front federation were also absent, a circumstance of considerable significance. The rival procession was that of the Building Trades' Council, which is under the control of Mr. Pin Head McCarthy. The processions were watched by a large concourse of people, but there was no enthusiasm along the line of march. If it were not for the music and the exuberance of the men in the ranks the silence of the populace might have given the impression that funeral processions were en route to a cemetery. Two years ago the labor parade evoked great enthusiasm, but it appears that there has been reaction in public sentiment. Have the sympathies of the great unorganized majority, which has suffered from the recurring clashes between labor and capital, and from the industrial unrest provoked by professional agitators, been alienated from the men who have permitted themselves to be used, at times, in the furtherance of the selfish interests of pestiferous demagogues? A few years ago there appeared to be a widespread sentiment in favor of improving the condition of the workingman, and he was encouarged to organize to that end, but in the pursuit of his own happiness he has been indifferent to the peace and comfort of others. That vast throng which witnessed the parade, and which was much more numerous than the marching workingmen, was dominated largely by those whose peace and comfort have been disturbed by industrial agitation.

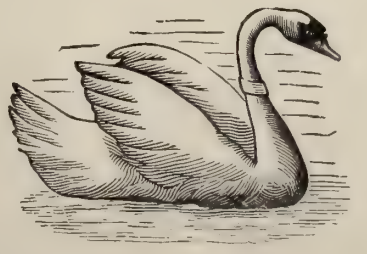
Those Indignant Book-Lovers



Now that the teacup tempest over the sale of old books from the Mercantile Library has subsided, it is in order to ask why these scholarly persons who imagine they have a grievance, either in not having had the volumes preserved for their use, or because they were not invited to make private bids at their own figure, did not patronize the library when it was located in its own home in Van Ness avenue. The Mercantile was then an ideal scholar's retreat. The spacious room, with its numerous alcoves and reading desks, invited reader or scholar, but where were they? The quiet and freedom from the noise and bustle of the commercial centre ought to have been an inducement to patrons, but evidently the "reading public" of San Francisco was bent on getting the latest boomer without paying a fee, or else considerd the library with its privileges a sort of side issue to a shopping tour, or a convenient rendezvous. When books lie on the shelves year after year, without ever being taken in hand for even a cursory examination, when reference volumes are never inquired for, and pamphlets and reports accumulate and other books become waste paper, either because later researches and discoveries make them useless or because new editions, in better type and handier form, replace them, there is no good reason why they should be retained to occupy much needed space, nor why the accumulations should not be disposed of for what they will bring. It is one of the problems of the British Museum, how to unwind sufficient red tape to enable the trustees to dispose of some of the accumulations which are not today worth housing. These people who are roaring lustily over the "vandalism" of the Mercantile Library trustees would not have bought in the books for their own private use if they had been solicited to do so. The chances are that they did not so much as know that the treasured volumes were in existence, much less had they any idea of ever referring to them.

Civilization to Blame

Recent statisticians have discovered that the birth-rate in all English-speaking countries is diminishing. The stationary population of France has long furnished a subject for sermonizing, but the Anglo-Saxon can no longer point fingers at the Gaul if the above statement be true. When analyzed it will be seen that the increased cost of maintaining a family counts for much in the problem. Even in the early part of the last century the wife was to some extent an industrial partner in the family concern and the children were helpless. Cloth was spun and woven at home; bread, beer and candles were of domestic manufacture; tailoring, dressmaking, cobbling and barbering were not infrequently done in the family. The outlay in time and labor was doubtless great, but in money, small. A wife and family in these days can do little toward saving money and very much toward spending it. All the requirements of life mean an outlay of coin. The wife no longer pickles and preserves; she makes neither bread nor clothes for the family, she does not cut her children's hair or doctor their infantile ailments. Civilization has increased our wants and our expenditures and we look with horror on the simple living of our grandfathers. We demand more exemption from toil, more amusement, better clothes, daintier food, more comfortable surroundings, ease and pleasure when we are well, trained nurses and skilled doctors when we are sick. The spirit of the age exacts that a man provide such things for his family according to his means, and indeed, often above them. The poor man who cannot do so is told that he has no business to marry and raise progeny. The fact is that a modern civilized individual is a very expensive person, and quite often costs more to raise than he is worth. If ever it should come to a desperate struggle for existence between Europeans and Orientals the more expensive race would go to the wall. It would be sadly ironical if at some future day our very material civilization, of which we boast so much, should lead to our undoing.

Our Strenuous President

BY A JEFFERSONIAN DEMOCRAT.

[Though the views and sentiments of "A Jeffersonian Democrat" do not coincide with those of the Editor of Town Talk, they are given space in these columns because they reflect in a measure the opinions and impressions of not only a large element of the Democracy, but also of many influential Republicans.]

Phineas T. Barnum was not only a great showman, but something of a philosopher, possessing a profound knowledge of average human nature, as evidenced by his reply to an inquiry why his shows were such a great success, "The American people like to be humbugged," he said. Since his death, his idea has been capitalized, so to speak, and those who became stockholders in the "humbug trust" have reaped a rich reward.

It will perhaps be denounced as treason to remark that the most conspicuous example of the success of the humbug trust is the accidental President of the United States—Theodore Roosevelt. The Republican admirers of President Roosevelt (and it must be conceded that this includes a large majority of the G. O. P.) will doubtless consider one who honestly entertains this belief as a political heretic and not a true American; and yet I think I can demonstrate that our national hero is about as big a political charlatan as any one who ever aspired to a nomination for the Presidency. That President Roosevelt is a mere political accident, no well-informed man will pretend to deny. Born with a silver spoon in his mouth, to his credit be it said he avoided the follies and extravagances of youths of his class; he made only a respectable figure at Harvard, and being endowed by Nature with a healthy body, naturally drifted to the mighty West, and played the role of cowboy for a few years. Returning to his native State, he was made a Police Commissioner, and endeavored to reform that corrupt body. At the outbreak of the Spanish war he was made Assistant Secretary of the Navy—not that he possessed any knowledge of warfare, but to placate the warring political factors of the Empire State. Soon tiring of this place, he organized a regiment of Rough Riders, which he was unfitted to command, and therefore turned it over to his political chum and parasite, Doctor Leonard Wood. The regiment proceeded to Cuba and participated in the charge at El Caney, where it would have been totally annihilated but for the timely arrival of the colored regulars, which perhaps in a measure accounts for the President's fondness for the sons of Ham. Returning to New York, the newspapers made him a hero; the picturesque costumes and the wonderful horsemanship of the cavalry from the "wild and woolly West," captivated the usually stolid citizen of the East, who had perhaps never witnessed anything in the equestrian line more exciting than the wild riding of the "gilded youth" in imitating the antics of the English aristocracy in the sportsmanlike and dangerous pursuit of the "aniseed bag."

Roosevelt was promptly nominated for Governor of New York, and of course, triumphantly elected. History contains no record of the defeat of a military hero immediately upon the conclusion of a successful foreign war. But whilst this election brought him to the front as a probable candidate for the Presidency, it has, and will prove, his political undoing. Roosevelt had always been ambitious and in his own estimation was a modern Cincinnatus, as well as a great military hero, and his success entitled him to believe that his opinion was shared by the great body of the people. The disease which he had contracted in a mild form, soon took on a more virulent type, and gradually developed into the most pronounced case of "swelled head" which has inflicted any statesman of modern times. He began at once to scheme for a second term as Governor of New York, which would doubtless place him far in the lead for the Presidential handicap; but "Me, too, Platt" and other astute manipulators determined that he should be shut out of the Presidential race, by giving him the nomination for the Vice-Presidency, which would effectively dispose of his aspirations.

Roosevelt vigorously protested; he wanted a nomination for Governor and would have nothing else. It was then that the political wire-pullers made this strenuous young statesman see and believe, that if he declined to be nominated for Vice-President, he would be defeated for the Governorship, and all his dreams of power "in the deep bosom of the ocean buried." Seeing nothing else worth striving for, like one of Byron's heroines, "whispering, she would ne'er consent, consented," Teddy was duly nominated for Vice-President, and notwithstanding vigorous protests, accepted as a "patriotic duty." It was a drastic dose but Roosevelt took it like a little man, and became a mere figure-head, to slumber and snore during the delivery of Senatorial speeches.

Such would have been his fate had it not been for that terrible tragedy that shocked the American people and the civilized world—the assassination of President McKinley. As a result of the insane act of a dastardly assassin, Roosevelt became President of the United States. Platt and his associates were dumbfounded, and the good Marcus Aurelius Hanna was shocked beyond measure, but they realized that the "best laid schemes of mice and men aft gang aglee." Roosevelt announced that his policy would be that laid down by his predecessor and that he would follow in the footsteps of the lamented McKinley, a promise that he has violated whenever he thought his personal ends would be subserved by so doing. From the moment that he took the oath of office until now, he has considered himself the whole show; the man on horseback, the Political Moses who was to lead his people across the Red Sea, and defeat the pursuers of his countrymen. One of his first acts was to humiliate General Miles, the Commander-in-Chief of the American armies, who was gallantly leading American soldiers to victory when Roosevelt was wearing swaddling clothes. His pursuit of Miles has been unrelenting since the very day he took office. He next turned his attention to the Navy, and undertook to blacken the character and belittle the deeds of Winfield Scott Schley, the real hero of Santiago. Every means which he could employ to defraud Schley and elevate his detractors was used without scruple. A packed court undertook to make Schley a mere machine to execute the orders of Sampson, and he was unscrupulously condemned by the President's pets, only to make him the most popular hero of the war. Schley uttered no words of protest, but contented himself with the sententious remark that the only trouble was that there was not glory enough to go all around.

The President's next effort was to secure, if possible, the negro vote in the South. Booker Washington was privately entertained by the President, and this raised a storm of protest, not only in the South but in the North as well. Concede the fact that the Anglo-Saxon prejudice against the social equality of the negro race is not founded in reason, yet no one will deny that it exists. But the Booker

Washington incident may be overlooked, although it had a powerful effect. Roosevelt was so much pleased at this strategic move that he overplayed his hand. He appointed Dr. Crump—no doubt a very respectable negro physician—Collector of the Port of Charleston. Then there arose all over the country a most vigorous protest. The merchants of Charleston sent a dignified document to the President asking that he withdraw the nomination, not on account of Dr. Crump's color but owing to his unfitness for the office. There was not a negro importer in Charleston, and surely the Collector of a great commercial metropolis was entitled to have for its Collector a person who knew something of the duties which he was selected to perform. But Roosevelt was persistent; "the King could do no wrong," and so, in the face of reasonable objections, Dr. Crump was appointed and a Republican Senate refused to confirm him. But what cared Roosevelt for Senators when they opposed his wish? Crump was re-appointed ad interim, and so the matter stands today. Teddy has deliberately placed his foot in a powerful trap, and he will have to extricate himself alone. No fair-minded man can conscientiously approve the President's course. Suppose any President—Republican or Democrat—should appoint a Chinaman Collector of the Port of San Francisco, what would the citizens of our city do? How would they receive such an appointment? and how would they regard a President who insisted upon humiliating them time and again? The question furnishes its own answer, and yet it would not be so unreasonable to appoint a Chinese Collector in this city as to appoint a negro in Charleston, for our city contains many large Chinese importers and they are thoroughly familiar with the duties of the office.

Roosevelt is undertaking to conduct the Presidential office entirely in the interest of himself and his friends. Charges were preferred against Dr. Wood for his administration of affairs in Cuba. He was charged with being interested in schemes for money gathering, by himself and friends, and also with receiving presents from those engaged in fraudulent enterprises to rob the Cubans. The charges were not even considered, for Doctor Wood was Teddy's fencing partner in Washington and therefore could do no wrong.

Congressman Littauer of New York was admittedly a partner in government contracts, in violation of law and all the canons of common decency, but he too was the President's "personal friend" and therefore entitled to eat at the Republican "pie counter" without let or hindrance.

Machen and Beavers were detected in stealing from the Post Office funds, but the two were the President's friends and must not be molested, for they were also potent factors in New York politics, and they were permitted to resign; and the fact that they have been indicted has not severed cordial relations with the President. Similar instances might be multiplied indefinitely. The American people will stand such things for a time, but the end is bound to come.

The Tragedy of the Ugly Woman

BY HARRY COWELL

I have seen a homely peasant girl with eyes that were intended by Nature for a great poet—eyes that had the properties of magic crystal. You needs must look into them, and did you but look long enough the imagination was sure to make features to match them; so that among those who knew her well this plain young woman passed for a rare beauty. She had no lack of lovers, and strangers who thought her ugly were put down as persons of the worst possible taste. The witchery of a smile may transfigure a face and cause even the most critical to forget its undeniable irregularity. Or a glory of hair may occasion a glamor in the beholding eye and give an appearance of general good looks. This relieved homeliness has for me unending charm. It is strange, suggestive, moving. Like flowing wind or fancy-provoking moonlight, it haunts the heart; a touch of it is worth more than all the mere prettiness in the world.

Then there is the refreshingly plain girl who tosses a tangle of red hair to the breeze and wears her freckles frankly—often without a single redeeming feature, but so careless of the humiliating fact, so unconscious of her ugliness, that you cannot well keep it in mind. You can even imagine the little heathen, Love, in his blindness bowing down to her, garlanding her with all the womanly graces and then worshiping the work of his dimpled hands, offering on suppliant knee the gift of gifts. Women adore her; to them she is "the dearest little fright imaginable," and no possible rival. As for men, they chum with her, and hear of her having a lover without the least envy. The news, in fact, is a fresh occasion for fancying themselves; they smile their congratulations in a superior way and go to where Beauty is awaiting them.

Last, and least, there is the ugly woman, that monstrous contradiction in terms, that ornithorhynchus unhappily not confined to Australia. Whenever I see her I am reminded of a saying of Renan's—"Even Divinity has its off-days." In face of the facts that thought is less irreverent than it reads. Surely All-Compassion did not design her. Is she conceivably the work of Omnipotent hands? Or did God make her of malice aforethought? She is rare not because Heaven is merciful, but because man has eyes. With me the ugly woman leads to more disbelief than all the arguments of the atheists. No Deity other than Chance could have created her—no, not even the Devil. Yet so perfect at times is the imperfection that the mind, baffled, falls back on Design. But would not beneficent Design have had a care for necessary correlations and made her indifferent to man? And we find her with a woman's heart, hungry for love, and a face that Love flees. Tragic is her lonely life and beautiful withal. It has for men a fascination such as she has not. To her fair sisters man's love is a thing easily won and, it may be, little prized. To her it is unattainable and has the beauty of things beyond reach. Her poor misshapen ears are ever alert for the "I love you" which more fortunate women hear and heed not. Vainly the repellant mouth awaits a lover's kiss. Her heart, it may well be, is as dripping full of sweet tenderness as is a hive of honey; but no man seeks to taste it. Gifts has she in abundance and a sore need of giving; a beneficiary, however, is not forthcoming. The very word Love sounds incongruous, almost grotesque, upon her lips, yet her soul knows its sacredness. She is capable of a devotion undreamed of by Beauty. Greatest of all love is that of the ugly woman. "Handsome is as handsome does," she quotes pathetically. "True," answers the logical sex, and marries to please the eye. Professional beauties make poor wives. Accustomed to obtain adoration on too easy terms, their conduct seldom matches their faces. Not infrequently are they wholly selfish, incapable of the least loving sacrifice. What matters it? Men marry them, and leave the mere doers of handsome things to die in loveless virginity. Seven times seven invisible cardinal virtues cannot offset the ugly woman's one sin against the sight. In sadder plight is she, for truth, than sinners in ordinary. Offer to God what man has, in effect, declined, she will not—that were meanness. What, moreover, are the consolations of religion to one who must perforce forego the delights of love? To sacrifice a here of earthly bliss for a hereafter of heavenly is at least heroic; but where is the merit in giving up a happiness that is not within one's hope, much less within one's hands?

Of a thousand womanly ways of making love by means of lures consciously or unconsciously used, not one is open to her. Coquetry is out of the question. An unattractive sincerity of manner is her necessity. She tries to make a virtue of it and pitiably fails. She will be your sister because you won't have her for wife; she defends Platonic affection and desires romantic love; she dare not be emotional, so goes in for cultivating the intellect; she is a blue-stocking who reads in secret Aucassin and Nicolette, Paul and Virginia, Romeo and Juliet, Paolo and Francesca. If a man pays her more than passing attention, her black beast, Pity, confronts her, and she resents the unwonted gallantry more than she would the rudest neglect.

Were some blind man, or one with spiritual sight, to penetrate that hideous mask of hers and behold the white beauty of her soul, and dream because of her the dream of dreams, there is every reason for thinking that she would never bring herself to believe that what she had so longed for, prayed for, despaired of, had at length come to pass. Highly probable it is that her lifelong tragedy would be brought to a logical conclusion. This in short would be her story: She was an ugly woman. All her days she sought love diligently. Once he offered himself to her. She did not take him. She never found him more.

Regents Consummate a Patronage Deal

When Charley Snook was appointed attorney for the Board of Regents of the State University last Tuesday, it was not because the gentlemen who voted for him believed that he was pre-eminently qualified for the position. Mr. Snook is probably competent to perform the duties of the office, but his appointment was unfortunate because it was the result of political wire-pulling. It is popularly believed that the State University, which the taxpayers of California maintain with commendable liberality, is as far removed from the polluting influence of politics as an ideal wife is from suspicion. The supposition is that the Regents of the State University administer the affairs of the institution with an eye only to its elevation, and that their virtuous indignation would be aroused if an attempt were made to inject politics into their deliberations. There is no higher position of trust and honor in this State than that of Regent of the University, but it has been demonstrated that the University Regents are not free from political influence. The appointment of Charley Snook proved that they are within reach of the tentacles of the political octopus. That appointment was made in pursuance of a patronage deal made by Henry T. Gage just before he retired into the obscurity of a Los Angeles law office.

How Gage Took Care of Foley

The story of that deal and of the transactions leading to its consummation is one that illumines the methods of patronage chasers, and that reveals some of the dips, spurs and angles of the political pasture. It dates back to the appointment, by Governor Gage, of Francis Foley to fill the vacancy on the Supreme bench caused by the death of Justice Temple. The daily papers have said that it grew out of complications over the appointment of the attorney for the Harbor Commissioners, but the dailies erred. The complications involved the higher office of Justice of the State's highest tribunal. Gage had made arrangements for taking care of his executive secretary, Will Davis, by exacting a promise from the Harbor Commissioners to appoint him to the attorneyship, and then he looked around for a job for his private secretary, Francis Foley. At first the announcement was looked upon as a joke. Foley had been a clerk in Gage's law office in Los Angeles, and nobody believed him to be qualified to become a Justice of the Supreme Court. Powerful influences were quickly brought to bear on Gage to dissuade him from making the appointment, and then Foley submitted a proposition which solved the problem.

Snook Gracefully Withdrew

Foley said that he did not care to become a Justice of the Supreme Court. He would be just as well satisfied to become the attorney for the State Board of Health at about one-third the salary of the more exalted position. But no vacancy would occur in that position until Governor-elect Pardee took office, and it was understood that his Oakland friend, Charley Snook, was slated for the job. Thereupon it dawned on the people who were anxious to keep Foley off the Supreme bench that that very important position was being used as a lever to lift the Los Angeles law clerk into a berth commensurable with his ability. However it was a case of urgent necessity and thereupon influence was brought to bear on the Governor-elect to persuade him to withdraw Snook from the fight for the attorneyship of the Board of Health. It was a complicated situation but satisfactory arrangements were made whereby Snook withdrew, with the understanding that all hands, including Gage, would secure for him the appointment to the Board of Regents. Thereupon Foley ceased to worry the people who objected to his becoming a Justice of the Supreme Court, and later on he was appointed attorney for the Board of Health.

End of a Lively Fight

Then came the fight in the Board of Regents. Colonel John Mhoon had long been the attorney for that body, but through negligence in his office some time ago the university lost fifty thousand dollars out of its endowment fund. It was a serious blunder that could not be overlooked, and as a consequence Colonel Mhoon sent in his resignation. Immediately there were two candidates for the vacancy, one of whom was Warren Olney, a young attorney, a graduate of Berkeley, who had distinguished himself as a professor of the law college. Several of his friends in the board, prominent among whom was Mrs. Hearst, thought that he would be the right man for the place, and they expected to procure his appointment without any trouble. But that was before they knew anything of that little deal by which Mr. Francis Foley wormed himself into the job of attorney for the State Board of Health. Ex-Governor Gage had some influence in the Board, having appointed several of the regents, and the politicians who kept Foley off the bench had, in the vernacular of the professional job-chaser, a powerful "drag." So the fight over the attorneyship was a very lively and protracted one. Governor Pardee, who graduated from Berkeley and who loves his Alma Mater dearly, kept "hands off" as he always does when he doesn't care to be mixed up in a nasty fight, but at the same time he overlooked no opportunity to secure the job and the salary for his friend Snook. Pardee wouldn't mix his Alma Mater up in politics for the world, but a vote was taken last Tuesday and Charley Snook won out.

"Hands-Off" Pardee

The Governor kept his hands off the attorneyship fight, as he did in the late primary election, when Martin Kelly's handy men were given jobs on a dredger. The future historian will in all probability dub the present Governor "Hands-off" Pardee. He announced that his hands were off the fight over the wardenship at San Quentin, though subsequent events made it appear that his hands were very much in evidence. When the investigation of the prison-break at Folsom was under way he again declared that his hands were off, and also referred to himself at the time as a "rank outsider." Evidently he loves to pose as a passive Executive, or else he imagines that he was elected merely for ornamental purposes. In political circles it is thought that he is nursing the delusion that he may escape responsibility for the acts of the various commissions by pretending to place implicit confidence in them.

Center's Little Joker

Since the return of Mr. William F. Herrin, the chief counsel of the Southern Pacific Company, and the man before whom all the small-fry political bosses, Democratic and Republican, bend the knee, the controversy over the Mission tracks has been renewed. The controversy has been raging for several years, and one of the most persistent of the property owners who are demanding that the tracks be removed is George Center, the real estate agent, and son of John Center, the capitalist. Ostensibly his interest is identical with that of other Mission property owners, but when the history of the right of way held by the Southern Pacific Company is considered, the suspicion arises that Mr. Center is actuated by motives of a more personal nature than those by which his associates are inspired. When reference is made to the history of that right of way a new light illumines the controversy. In its effulgence Mr. Center looms not as a blatant reformer of the type of his associate, Mr. Max Popper, but as a sensible, shrewd business man who is engaged in turning an opportunity to advantage. Of course he is primarily interested as a property owner in having the tracks removed, because as they are now maintained, on the surface, they are somewhat of a nuisance, but if ever that right of way should be abandoned Mr. Center would be considerably enriched.

What Will Probably Be Done

The right of way which Mr. Center is desirous of having closed was at one time the property of his father, John Center. It was deeded by him to the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad, in the early sixties, and the deed contains a clause to the effect that if ever it should cease to be used for railroad purposes the title would revert to the grantor or his heirs. The strip deeded by Mr. Center extends from San Jose avenue to a point near Twelfth street, and if it were divided into lots and put on the market it could be sold for about one hundred thousand dollars. Mr. John Center is taking no part in the controversy over the tracks, and it is doubtful, if he did, whether, in equity, he could take advantage under his deed, of a condition for which he was responsible. But his heir, Mr. George Center, was not a party to that deed. It is possible that the Centers have no notion now of recovering the property, but if the tracks were removed they would surely not remain insensible of their rights very long. When the controversy over the tracks was first started the agitators insisted that the railroad company should not be granted the Bay Shore franchise until it agreed to relinquish the right-of-way through the Mission, but the authorities are no longer making that a condition precedent. They realize that the Bay Shore franchise is of urgent necessity owing to the development of traffic between this city and the southern part of the State. The mercantile houses are as eager for that franchise to be granted as the Mission property owners are for the removal of the Mission tracks. I have no doubt that before long those tracks will either be depressed or raised. That is now the alternative accepted by railway companies in many large cities.

Lamas Disagree

The lamas of the Republican League have not yet agreed on a candidate for Mayor. They say they have abundant material from which to choose, but there are differences of opinion as to the relative strength of the men whose names have been suggested. Sheriff Lackman has been favorably considered by one or two of the lamas, but he is persona non grata to editors De Young and Spreckels. John Lynch is in favor of nominating Treasurer McDougald on account of his popularity in Labor Union and Native Son circles, but Abe Ruef is as strenuously opposed to McDougald's nomination as he is in favor of the endorsement of Schmitz. The nomination of McDougald, it is thought, would prove fatal to Schmitz. Henry J. Crocker has been touted persistently by many politicians, and there has been some talk of running Dr. McNutt, but the latter is averse to becoming a candidate. His present political ambition is to become a delegate to the National Convention. It is evident that the Republican lamas are far from harmonious these days, and it is predicted that a split will occur before long.

Phelan's Malapropisms

President Phelan of the Bohemian Club is noted for his absent-minded breaks. He is a male Malaprop but his mistakes are not those of ignorance—only of carelessness. The other evening at the club, when introducing Ben Greet, manager of "Everyman," as an after-dinner speaker, he said: "Gentlemen, I take great pleasure in presenting to you Mr. Ben Greet, manager of the Mortality Play." The funny part of it was that the break was so pat, for the play deals almost exclusively with death and the smell of mortality is rank through it. It savors far more of mortality than of morality. This break reminds me of another which Phelan once made before the Chamber of Commerce. He was Mayor at that time and he was called on to introduce Lord Beresford. In introducing His Lordship Mr. Phelan said: "I take pleasure in introducing Lord Beresford, and if the Lord will tell us what he knows of China I'm sure we shall know all about it." A smile rippled all over the room and Mr. Phelan colored and said, smilingly, "Of course I meant His Lordship, but a good democrat must be pardoned for occasionally tripping over these titles of aristocracy." Lord Beresford appeared to enjoy it.

The Heir Presumptive

Ned Greenway has his successor in training, I hear, and in the course of time we shall hail a scion of one of our best old families as McAllister III. The young man is none other than Milton Latham, son of the late United States Senator, and related to any number of blue bloods far and near. Greenway some time since took young Latham as his assistant in business and one of the first things the latter did was to make peace with the Hotel Rafael management. After Baron von Schroeder's cut by San Francisco's prudish elite, it will be remembered, the Baron retaliated by cutting Czar Greenway's wines from his hotel wine-card. But Milton Latham, who is a genial chap and a master of diplomacy, made the matter right and now the wines are on the card again. Apropos of the Von Schroeders, I hear that one reason why they returned to Germany was that they have not nearly so much of an income as they had, and cannot live in this country in the style they enjoy. In Germany everything costs less and one can cut quite a dash on a moderate income.

Mrs. Martin's Recipe

Before Mrs. Eleanor Martin departed for Newport it was remarked how well she was looking, and some one asked her what was her Ponce de Leon secret. It was suspected that the local leader of society had discovered a new beauty doctor and was keeping the discovery to herself. But Mrs. Martin has not been emulating Sarah Bernhardt or any other Ninon d'Enclos of modern times. The secret of how she manages to keep up, go the round of society and take trips to Newport, is a very simple one. She sleeps between meals. Mrs. Martin has lately taken siestas three or four times a day and she pronounces the medicine most refreshing.

Mrs. Oelrichs's Protege

In Madame Bavarde's chat the other night I read that Miss Chandos-Pole is desirous of paying a visit to the Pacific Coast of which she has heard so many nice things. It was generally supposed out here that the Miss Chandos-Pole who was in San Francisco last June and who startled the diners at the Palace Grill by smoking a cigarette before them all, and the Miss Chandos-Pole who has been electrifying Newport with her eccentricities, were one and the same person. My New York correspondent writes me that Miss Margaret Chandos-Pole is really the reigning sensation at Newport this summer. She came over from Europe to visit Miss May Van Alen, who was her bosom friend. She is a daughter of Lady Anna Chandos-Pole, whose father was the fifth Earl of Harrington. Her sister,

A car-load of the wines of the Mont Rouge Vineyard was shipped to New York early this week by Chauche & Bon. New York club men are beginning to appreciate California wines, and the products of the Mont Rouge vineyard have contributed greatly to their enlightenment.

Lady Claude Hamilton, is prominent in the London swim, and her brother, Samuel Chandos-Pole, was the hero of a salacious divorce suit four years ago. She is a representative of that London smart set whose social modes are pictured with photographic truth and sculptural distinctness in the plays of Pinero. She has changeable eyes, chameleon-like, thick brown hair which she wears on the nape of her neck, and in a way she affects the style of Mrs. Pat Campbell. Newport's smart women are copying her hats because they are so "extremely stunning," but nobody cares to copy her gowns because they are "sloppy looking." She wears rattlesnake-skin slippers and she is considered altogether the most picturesque woman who ever visited Newport, not even excepting Lady Constance MacKenzie, who went to a luncheon in riding trousers with no skirt to conceal them. Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs chaperoned Miss Chandos-Pole over from Europe and the latter is "Margie" to "Tessie." This English girl calls herself a bachelor maid and prides herself on her icy heart. But my correspondent informs me that she is suspected of having designs on a widower, who is none other than Jimmy Van Alen, the father of Miss May. Indeed, it is said that May Van Alen grew suspicious some weeks ago and left home on that account. On her last visit to this country Miss Chandos-Pole was reported to be engaged to Chauncey Depew.

A Colored Social Lion

A South Carolina negro is supplying the latest thrill to fashionable Newport's jaded emotions. His name is Joseph Loftin and he is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Pembroke Jones. He is described as being remarkably handsome and of impressive appearance. Newport has made a pet of this distinguished looking colored gentleman. At all social functions, theatre and yachting parties, he is the central figure. He is a cultured man, talks several languages, and has many social graces, but he is admired by the fashionables of Newport principally for his striking physique, which is in pleasing contrast to the effeminate frame of the insipid Lehr. There is strength in the lines of his lusty limbs, there is beauty in the contour of his graceful torso, and there is a charm in the glister of his Senegambian hair. He has been pronounced the handsomest "coon" that ever came out of the South, and even though he possessed no scholarly attainments, the novelty of his pulchritude would appeal to the craving for variety of the Desdemonas of Newport.

A Marvel of Industry

The success in the East of Theodore Kremer continues to surprise his friends in this city. Kremer is a handsome young German who spent several years here writing bad plays. They were cheap melodramas and he appeared in them for the purpose, it was supposed, of proving that he could act worse than he wrote. He produced at the old Bush street theatre a rehash of "Magda" called "The Church or Stage," with Jeffreys Lewis in the leading role, and it was a failure. He couldn't act and he couldn't write, and his only capital was a perfect profile and unlimited assurance. He went to New York in despair and there he found his metier. His plays were accepted by a a firm of managers who send out endless companies to produce cheap melodramas on the road. Kremer writes the plays and rehearses the companies. The papers have been writing him up as a wonder, and they have been telling how he was recently rehearsing in one day four "Fatal Wedding" companies, two "For Her Children's Sake" companies, one "Evil That Men Do," one "Wedded and Parted" and one "Rachel Goldstein" company. His profits are sixty thousand a year but he is threatened with nervous prostration.

The Guessing of the Gossips

Knox Maddox is becoming an enigma to the smart set. Nobody imagines that he prefers bachelorhood to wedded bliss, and yet he appears to be a laggard in love. All this summer the gossips have been kept guessing as to whether his engagement with Miss Suzanne Blanding would soon be announced, and they are still speculating. Some years ago they expected him to win Miss Elena Robinson, but they were disappointed. He was one of her most devoted cavaliers when she made her debut under the protecting wing of Mrs. Eleanor Martin. Miss Blanding is a very charming young girl. Owing to the numerous bereavements in the Tevis family she has not been seen much in local society, but she spent much time in the social whirl of the East. She is a daughter of the Gordon Blandings and a niece of Dr. Harry Tevis.

The Postleys are Going

The Stirling Postleys are to leave for the East in about a week to visit relatives. Mrs. Postley will spend a deal of time with the Allan Wallaces. She is a great friend of Mrs. Wallace, and is said to have made the Wallace match. Mr. Postley's sister came out last winter in New York, and the senior Postleys are taking a great interest in society on her account. They were abroad all summer, and now they are preparing for the winter social campaign. Mrs. Postley Sr. was a Miss Singer and she inherited a large fortune. As Mrs. Postley Jr. is the lady who is said to have been pronounced by Duke Boris the most beautiful woman he had seen in America, she will no doubt be the object of considerable interest in New York.

Mrs. Parker Whitney is at "The Pines," Upper Dam, Maine, for the early fall season.

Kelly Exposes His Own Fake

After many years Allen Kelly has confessed that he didn't capture Monarch, the big grizzly who has for many years been one of the most attractive features of Golden Gate Park. In a book which he has recently published he proudly admits that the "capture" of Monarch was a fake which he helped to perpetrate at the instigation of the editor of the Examiner. Evidently Mr. Kelly regards the fake as a very creditable achievement, and in repudiating the confidence reposed in him by the man by whom he was employed he suffers not the slightest qualm of conscience. He is probably guided by a code of ethics of his own creation. He relates that the newspaper first sought to obtain a grizzly by purchase, intending if successful to fake a story of his capture, but no captive grizzly could be found. Then "the enterprising journal was constrained to resort to the prosaic expedient of laying a foundation of fact and veritable achievement for its self-advertising." After some months of ineffectual attempt to trap a bear he bought one from a Mexican and sold it to the San Francisco editor, who presented it to Golden Gate Park. The newspaper account of the capture of Monarch, says Mr. Kelly, "was elaborated to suit the exigencies of enterprising journalism, picturesque features were introduced where the editorial judgment dictated, and mere facts, such as the name of the county in which the bear was caught, fell under the ban of a careless blue pencil and were distorted beyond recognition." Mr. Kelly is not a veracious chronicler. He did not sell the bear to the editor of the Examiner. During the months spent by him in trying to trap a bear he was a salaried reporter of the Examiner and he purchased the bear with Mr. Hearst's money. It is easy to understand that in exposing the fake Mr. Kelly should not like to present himself in his true light. I believe that he also wrote the story of the capture, and at any rate I know that for a long time after the metropolitan debut of Monarch, Allen Kelly posed as a hero even among his intimate friends, all of whom believed that he trapped the grizzly.

"Why do you think she is bourgeois?"

"Because I heard that she objected to her husband's flirtations with other women."

It Won't Be Spectacular

Miss Kip has received an unusually large collection of engagement presents of all sorts. The time and place of her wedding have not yet been determined, but the friends of her girlhood are hoping that it will occur here. However as the Kips are in mourning it is not likely to be a spectacular affair, and consequently there will be much disappointment, for society dearly loves a splurge.

They're After Him

The French naval officers in port are being rushed by society as they were never rushed before. It will be hard for them to break away from this port. Miss Genevieve King is one of the most popular of society girls aboard the Protet. The Frenchmen like her because she speaks their language so fluently. She has studied several languages and speaks them all well, and I believe that she loves books more than society. The commander of the Protet is the most interesting of all the French officers because he is a widower and therefore an eligible. The girls have made a great fuss over him, and he likes being lionized.

Separation of the McLeans

The divorce of Dr. Robert McLean was a great surprise to his many acquaintances. Mrs. McLean was a widow from the southern part of the State, and she bore a striking resemblance to the doctor's first wife. He was nearly dead when he fell in love with her but his marriage seemed to give him a new lease of life. Though he was suffering from a stroke of paralysis he regained strength rapidly, and appeared to be on the road to complete recovery. His domestic trouble is said to have been due to his eccentricities.

"With what weapon did David slay the Philistines?" asked the Sunday-school teacher.

Little Tommy made quick reply: "With the axe of the Apostles," he said.

Quit His Father's Firm

Ben Upham has wearied of a prosaic mercantile career, and has drawn out of the firm of Payot, Upham & Co. His father paid him ten thousand dollars for his interest in the business and now he contemplates buying a cattle ranch. I believe it was Whitaker Wright, the great financier, who said that a man with ten thousand dollars may do anything in a financial way. But it was from trying to do too much that Mr. Wright landed in jail.

She's Now a Light-Weight

The metamorphosis of Helen Dean is the subject of much comment. She is now being admired for her lithe, beautiful figure. It has leaked out that when she went East it was chiefly for the purpose of separating herself from large rolls of superfluous flesh. Though tall, she carried too much weight. She tipped the beam, I believe, at two hundred. In the East she resorted to a flesh-reducing treatment and now she has a graceful figure. There are doctors in the East who roll you in cold sheets and reduce your flesh at a great rate, but it is said to play havoc with a woman past thirty; it produces wrinkles. I hear that Athol McBean is the latest ardent admirer of Miss Dean.

An Expected Announcement

Fred Greenwood has evidently determined that there is no hope of his ever gaining Miss Katherine Dillon's favor, for he has definitely determined upon a trip to China and Japan this fall. I have it on excellent authority that at some not far distant day Miss Dillon's engagement will be formally announced. The happy man is said to be that gallant naval officer, Emery Winship, now on duty at the Union Iron Works superintending the work on the new war vessel for the Government. Miss Dillon was expected home yesterday. Her new home is nearly complete, the carpets having been laid and only the finishing touches of the furnishing being left for the supervising eye of the fair owner.

"What! two dollars and a half for a dish of frogs' legs?" exclaimed Mrs. Globetrotter, "why, in Toronto I can get them for thirty-five cents."

"But, madame," deprecated the garcon, "think how much the railroad fare to Toronto would be!"

A Match That Caused Surprise

Mrs. Georgia Kelsey Terry caused a great sensation in Stockton when she sprung a surprise on her friends at a tea last Saturday, by announcing the engagement of her daughter, Miss Bernie Terry, and Frank Allen West, the wealthy vineyardist and wine maker. The interest in this engagement is not confined to society circles, for Frank West is a genial, generous business man whom all classes respect and admire. The announcement of the engagement was a surprise because the gossips thought that West's affections had been won by another Stockton girl. Indeed, the gossips believed that the match had been made. However there are a few who remarked that he had lately been quite devoted to the Terrys, though they thought it was the mother of his fiancee in whom he was more interested. Mr. West is a mature man and a widower. His first wife was Miss Evelyn Sperry, a cousin of Mrs. Will Crocker and of the Princess Poniatowski. She was an invalid and was most tenderly cared for by her husband. The West home at El Pinal is the handsomest country place near Stockton, and is presided over by Mr. West's widowed mother and a bachelor sister who is one of the most interesting and lovable women in the county.

She Is One of the Famous Terrys

Miss Terry is a slender, graceful girl, blonde, spirituelle and pretty. She is the only child of the late Reel B. Terry and only grandchild of the late famous Judge David Terry. Her mother was one of the charming Kelsey girls who became severally Mrs. Van R. Paterson, Mrs. Reel B. Terry, Mrs. Eugene Wilhoit, Mrs. Frank Lane and Mrs. Otto Grunsky. By the death of her latest husband Mrs. Terry was thrown on her own resources and she came back to Stockton, where her widowed mother lives, and opened the Kelsey home to a number of friends as a select boarding house and has thereby maintained herself and daughter ever since. The old Kelsey house in El Dorado street, with its fine background of majestic trees, is one of the most attractive of Stockton homes. It has sheltered as fair and interesting a bevy of girls as ever graced a California town, and this latest romance is but one of many that had their inception therein and the memory of which linger about it like the scent of roses.

When West and Weber Fell Out

George West, who was the father of the present big vineyardist, was one of the early pioneers who shared with Captain Weber and others the distinction of laying the foundation of the present city of Stockton. It is related that the two hardy pioneers once disagreed about some business matter and that for a time they did not speak as they passed by. One day it became necessary to have a conference on some matter of importance and the two men met in the office of Lewis Cutting, the agent of one of them. Never a word did they speak as they glared at each other, after the fashion of "Buck" and "Spitz" in Jack London's tale. Presently old Captain Weber, stubborn and bristling, said, "Mr. Cutting, ask Mr. West if he agrees to these terms," and painstakingly Mr. Cutting repeated the request and the terms. With equal dignity, Mr. West responded, "Mr. Cutting, please inform Captain Weber that I do not agree—no, sir!" And again Mr. Cutting repeated the words, the two men standing not more than four feet apart, but refusing to speak to each other except through a third person, and in their anger wholly unconscious of the humor of the situation.

Social Career of a Seamstress

The despatches, a few days ago, contained a brief announcement of the marriage of Mrs. Anna Agnew Davis, of Minnesota, to Hunter Doll of Knoxville, Tennessee. This is the same Mrs. Davis who conducted a strenuous campaign for social recognition in Washington some years ago, and who, despite the most bitter opposition and persistent snubbing, never faltered for a moment and finally succeeded in getting through the portals. She endured much humiliation and amazed people by her courage and tenacity. Five years ago she was a plain seamstress employed in the Davis household. She had been married to a printer but was divorced from him. She was then a beautiful young woman and she had many admirers but none received any encouragement. Governor and Mrs.

"I WANT JACKSON'S NAPA SODA"

Davis lived unhappily and shortly after the handsome seamstress entered their household they were divorced. A year later Davis married the humble grass-widow, who was promptly cut by the smart set, it being the theory of some of the social leaders that she was the cause of the estrangement between her husband and Mrs. Davis No. 1. A little later Davis was elected to the Senate, and then his wife took up her residence in Washington and opened her social campaign.

A Cruel Snub

The atmosphere of the capital congealed as soon as Mrs. Davis betrayed symptoms of a social ambition. Wherever she appeared society wore its most freezing aspect. Senator Davis did not care for society, but he was very fond of his handsome wife, and he gave her money with which to entertain in royal style, but she had no opportunity to extend the hospitality of her beautiful home. The wives of the Senators, ignoring the rules of social intercourse which have governed the Senatorial set since the days of Jefferson, refused to make the first call on the wife of the new member. The bitterest experience of Mrs. Davis was at a reception given by Mr. and Mrs. Wanamaker. All Washington society was there and when Mrs. Davis put in an appearance the assembled fashionables drew away as if to avoid contamination. Mrs. Davis—tall, beautifully gowned, and with a smile on her face—advanced a few steps into the principal drawing-room, and at that moment a hush fell upon the assembled guests. The women stared coldly, their escorts tried to look indifferent. It was a critical and thrilling moment for the young woman from Minnesota. It happened that Mr. and Mrs. Wanamaker were in another drawing-room at that moment, and nobody advanced to greet the newcomer. She seemed to fully comprehend the significance of the situation, and a deadly pallor overspread her face. There was a frightened look in her lustrous eyes and she seemed as though she were going to sink to the floor.

Her Triumph

Suddenly the tense situation, so full of dramatic interest, was broken. First Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson happened to enter the drawing-room with his wife just as the lonely woman was about to collapse. They took in the situation at a glance, and advancing quickly to the side of Mrs. Davis greeted her warmly. Mr. Clarkson gave her his arm, and led her to the other drawing-room where he presented her to the host and hostess. They in turn introduced her to many friends, and thus was the misery of those first few moments, when she was made the victim of as cruel a snub as was ever witnessed, assuaged by cordial attentions that completely restored her composure. Mr. Davis rose to such importance in the Senate that in time his wife triumphed socially, and later on, when he was appointed a member of the Paris Peace Commission, she visited the gay French capital where she made a great social hit, and was voted one of the most beautiful women that had ever come from America. Now she is the wife of a man fifteen years her junior, a fine looking, athletic fellow who served through the Spanish war as a volunteer in Cuba.

Shy of a Shirt

Duval Moore, son of George Moore, the wealthy merchant, is something of a wag. He was expecting some friends from the East recently, and was to have met them at Sacramento, but at the last moment he wired briefly his excuse for not putting in an appearance. This was the despatch: "Can't come. Haven't a clean shirt."

Miller's Successful Bluff

Henry Miller, the student who kept the teachers of the San Jose Normal School and the "push" politicians of the town on the anxious seat for the past four years, has shaken the dust of the Garden City from his feet. He left last week after having scored a triumph over his enemies. Many people heaved a sigh of relief when he left. His future home will be Yuma, Arizona, where he has secured the principalship of a school. He was out on bonds pending a trial for criminal libel and when it became known that he was going to leave some of his enemies informed him that his bonds would be forfeited. A few days later he spread the report that he was going to revive his paper, the Crucible, and start another crusade against those who were opposing him. He promised that it would be the "hottest sheet" that ever left a printing press, and he threw out a few hints as to the character of the articles he had prepared for publication concerning the inside affairs of the Normal School, and of the doings of corrupt politicians. He soon received word that the libel case would be dismissed, and then he decided not to issue the paper. The night before his departure an entertainment was given in his honor in the parlors of the Unitarian church.

Garden City society was surprised the other day over the announcement of the engagement of Miss Lizette Howard, daughter of Mrs. Bertha A. Howard, one of San Jose's fairest, with Glenn Cobb Barnhardt of this city. The wedding is to take place in Trinity Episcopal church, September sixteenth. Miss Howard and Mr. Barnhardt were very good friends about three years ago and they were supposed at that time to be engaged. Then there came an estrangement and it was rumored that the young couple had decided that it was best for their paths to lead apart. The recent announcement of their re-engagement came quite suddenly and was of course a surprise.

Notable Achievements of Two Girls

Far out among the pines of Laurel avenue, in Pacific Grove, where one can catch a glimpse of the whitecaps as they flash in the sunlight, two young women clad in short skirts of coarse material, and in leggings and broad brimmed hats, have been toiling day after day during the long summer in the construction of a cottage. And their work is now complete. A handsome three-roomed cottage with all modern conveniences stands as a monument to their industry and skill. All the work was done by their fair hands, save the building of the chimney. Even the furniture was made by them, and is in the latest Roycroft patterns, and on the whole they have done very artistic work. A week ago they rented their cottage for thirty-five dollars a month. The two young artisans are Miss Lillian Palmer, daughter of Don Palmer, a well known capitalist and mining man who resides in San Jose, and Miss Emily Williams, daughter of Mrs. E. D. Williams, a society and club woman of the same town. Miss Palmer is a former Stanford co-ed and later studied journalism under Morrow. Miss Williams is a favorite in society circles in the Garden City. Some time ago she studied architecture in a San Jose office. The plans of the cottage were conceived last winter and Miss Williams drew them up and last spring she went to work with her friend. They have reason to be proud of their notable achievement.

In Nature's Garb They Hurried Home

Two girls who went bathing in the surf at Monterey a short time ago found themselves in a dreadful predicament after their swim. The scene of their swim was far from all human habitation save the tents where they were camping for the summer. As they had never seen any one pass that way, and as they preferred to swim without incumbrance, they took their plunge in the altogether, leaving their clothes on the shore under a tree. They went far out into deep water, and were swimming around for nearly an hour. When they emerged from the water they were horrified to find that their clothes were missing. There was little time to think, for though there was not even a fig-leaf in sight the fact that their clothes were missing made it evident that strangers were in the neighborhood. There was nothing to do but to run for the tents, some distance away, and that is what they did, and one of the girls relates that her only impulse was to conceal her identity, and that during her home run she concealed her face with her hands. When she thought of it afterwards she felt that she had the instinct of the ostrich. The next day both girls found their clothes a short distance from where they had disrobed. They would now like to know who the practical joker was that had a little fun at their expense.

Peeping Dames Used Field Glasses

The Monterey incident reminds me that the curiosity of women is sometimes aroused by fleshly exhibits of the masculine sex. Though the nude in art does not shock them it is an infraction of the penal code to confront them with some forms of the nude in nature. Yet here in San Francisco and in fashionable boarding houses there are women who use opera glasses and powerful field glasses to bring the nude in nature close enough for their inspection. The spectacle that these women appear to relish is presented almost daily on the roof of the Olympic club where a solarium was recently constructed to enable the athletes and health-seekers of the institution to take a sun bath. It is so situated that the windows from which the occupants may be observed are too far distant for objects to be clearly discerned. But the members have discovered that opera and field glasses are employed by women in distant windows to render the sun-bathers more distinct to the peeping dames.

Frank Leslie's Weekly recently mentioned Mrs. Fremont Older's "The Socialist and the Prince" among the dozen books of fiction that one should read this summer. The list opened with the latest book from the pen of Henry James.

The Ways of the Bounder

One of the Daughters of the Confederacy is telling a story about the bad manners of a woman who is rather prominent just at present in the social world. The latter was calling on the Daughter, with whom she was but slightly acquainted, with another woman. Hardly were they admitted to the house when they began an inspection of the bric-a-brac and other articles scattered about the rooms. Finally the sideboard in the dining-room was reached when, with the remark from one of them, "Just look at these," it was pounced upon and every piece of silverware taken up for examination, weighed in the hand and an estimate made of its probable value. Among the articles was a rather large piece of plated ware. The hostess's disgust was intense when she was accosted by the lady less known to her with:

"I say, why don't you sell this? You know you'd get more for it than if it was the genuine thing."

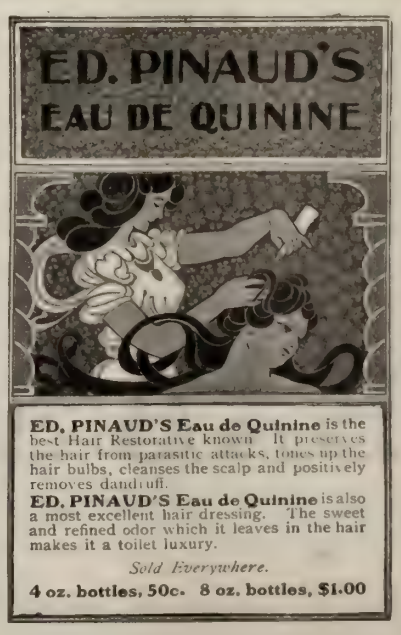
A House With a Past

The Crocker, which so narrowly escaped destruction by fire the other day, is one of the few remaining of our early day homes that are now so rapidly giving way to more modern buildings. It was originally a modest little house, and was for a time occupied by the family of the late Major Hensley. When the upheaval of the Bonanza mines brought wealth to so many, among the fortunate ones was Ned Hall, a broker who purchased the property, rebuilt the house on a larger plan, furnished it elaborately, and for a time with his wife rode upon the top wave of society. But the fortunes of those days in many cases did not last. Ned Hall was not long in coming to grief. From what was then considered a palatial abode he walked out with only the clothes on his back, and with three other male friends occupied the little cottage which stood at the southeast corner of California and Franklin streets. Mrs. Hall went to Europe, residing in Paris for several years, where she had some startling experiences. After Hall's failure his home became the property of the late Colonel Fred Crocker, and on the latter's marriage with Jennie Easton it was there he brought his bride. He resided there until his death. Afterward the house was enlarged and converted into a family hotel.

Bent on Certain College Reforms

Just now student life in Berkeley is in the throes of a particularly lively moral drenching. This moral shower-bath is not to be escaped in the college halls or in the privacy of the boarding houses. In the one place the most conspicuous show card is the presentation of great morality plays, the kind supposed to instil in the spectator the higher ideals of life and living; in the boarding houses the enthusiastic members of the Young Woman's Christian Association are engaged in an active crusade to impress the conviction on the students that it is possible for the sexes to study together without the young men going to the rooms of the young women for that purpose. With that end in view they have got numbers of the boarding house keepers to set aside parlors and sitting-rooms for the use of the young women who expect visitors of the other sex. The crusade is not meant in the slightest degree as a reflection on any one but simply as an effort to remedy certain college conditions.

Boarding-House Keepers Will Help



So very rapidly has the student body grown in the last few years that conventional customs have been in some measure crowded a bit. In order to meet the increasing demand for rooms the boarding house keepers have been forced to use everything in the shape of four walls. In this wise many of the parlors set aside in each house for the reception of visitors have been refitted and used for sleeping apartments. There being no general room therefore for the reception of visitors, the custom has gradually slipped in of a caller going directly to a student's room. Most of the girls had the bedsteads removed, hunted for bizarre effects, and gave their apartments the air of general utility that betokens a hall lounging room. There they received their callers, studied with such men student friends as occasion demanded and entertained classmates in general whenever they could afford it. Hearst hall and the Library corners had been provided for these "meets" but those places weren't always convenient, especially in the evening. But everything is going to be satisfactorily arranged now that the members of the Young Woman's Christian Association have got the boarding house keepers to promise to fit up reception rooms for the benefit of male callers so that there will be no further occasion for the men students to study in the rooms of the women students.

"My dear," said the disgruntled husband, "I wouldn't object to your talking so much if the volume of your utterances was not altogether out of proportion with what you say."

Condolences Out of Order

There were two couples who had been very intimate in Oakland society. One man with his wife went abroad and before many months the news reached them that the wife of the man who remained in Oakland had died. The pair abroad sent letters of commiseration to the bereaved husband. Less than a year afterward the traveling Oaklander returned to California and on the street he encountered his old friend. He put his arm affectionately about the other's shoulder and said, "My dear fellow, I can't tell you how sorry I was to hear of your bereavement."

No tears welled up in the other's eyes, though the eyes of the sympathizing friend were moist.

"Well, yes, of course," he stammered with some embarrassment, "but you see, my dear fellow—I thank you very much, I'm sure—but you see, I am married again."

Nina Wants Company

Nina Farrington, the actress, with a record as a home-breaker that long since shadowed her histrionic achievements, is threatening to cast a bombshell right into the centre of New York's social Holy of Holies. It appears that Miss Farrington has at length grown weary of playing the part of co-respondent without an understudy. She was recently named as co-respondent in the Johnstone divorce case, and she says that at the proper time she will divulge the fact that the defendant was also criminally intimate with the wife of a prominent yachtsman, the daughter of a noted millionaire and a woman prominent in Newport's social circles. It is said that this woman is known to Mrs. Johnstone, and was at one time her friend. For this reason her name was not mentioned. Mrs. Johnstone thought that as Miss Farrington had no reputation to lose she would be willing to play the role of co-respondent once more, but the actress knew that she did not enjoy a monopoly of Johnstone's affections, for she had obtained a packet of letters written to him by the society woman in a cipher code which he had also used with her. So she has decided, she says, that if she is to endure the ignominy of being publicly pilloried she will at least be in good company. She has placed the packet of letters in the hands of her lawyers, and all Newport is on the qui vive for another salacious sensation. But I doubt that the letters will ever be produced. They are as good as gold to the actress and her lawyer, and the millionaire father will probably be able to negotiate their exchange for bank notes.

Enlightened selfishness is a good thing for people who have formed the treat habit.

Why He Was Episcopalian

Mrs. Hittell told a good story at the Pioneer Women's meeting last Wednesday. It was about a man who was asked what religious denomination he belonged to. He said he was an Episcopalian.

"What church do you belong to?" he was asked.

"Oh, I don't belong to any church," he answered.

"Well, what diocese, then, are you located in?"

"No diocese that I know of," he returned.

"Have you been confirmed?"

"No, I can't say I was ever confirmed."

"Well, when were you baptized?"

"I don't remember that I was ever baptized."

"Well," was the emphatic observation, "if you were never baptized and never confirmed, how does it happen you call yourself an Episcopalian?"

"Well," answered the man, "It was this way. One day I dropped into an Episcopal church. There was one part where they all said, 'We have done those things we ought not to have done, and left undone those things we ought to have done.' When I heard that, I said to myself, that's my case exactly. And since then I've been an Episcopalian."

"Jimmy the Ramrod"

Within a few days we shall have a visit from Commander Sidney A. Staunton, U. S. Navy, otherwise known in the service as "Jimmy the Ramrod," a sobriquet he earned years ago from the circumstance of his being slenderly sparred with a decided rake aft. This is an age of specialism, and nearly every officer in the navy has his special line of activity. Staunton's specialty, until reaching command rank, was the duty of flag-lieutenant. He has been a professional flag-lieutenant. He served as such under Rear-Admiral S. R. Franklin, on the European station; under Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, in the famous squadron of evolution, better known as the "white squadron"; later on, in the squadron collected for the naval review in 1893, and finally, he was Sampson's flag-lieutenant on the New York in the West Indies during the Spanish war. He is regarded as one of the brainiest officers of the navy, and the manner in which he has performed the duties, always delicate, as a member of an admiral's personal staff, has set a standard which others are glad to reach. He has been detached from the command of the gunboat Helena, on "Fighting Bob" Evans's Asiatic station, and ordered to return to this country, where, I believe, a good shore billet is awaiting him. He will stop for a few days in this city on his way to his home in the East.

Ignorance of the Law

One needs but spend a little time in the courts of this city to become impressed with the surprising ignorance of the law that is to be found in the legal profession. There are lawyers galore practicing law in this city who do not know the most familiar of the rudimentary principles, and yet they are exacting fees from clients every day. Of course, in so doing, they are obtaining money under false pretenses, for to employ them is to divert justice from the cause which they are hired to espouse. The other day the trial of a divorce suit was started in one of the courts. It was a simple default case, the husband not caring to resist. The attorney for the plaintiff called her to the witness stand to introduce the proof of desertion, that being the alleged cause of action.

"Your husband deserted you, did he not?" asked the attorney.

"Indeed he didn't," was the emphatic reply, "I left him."

The lawyer looked nonplussed. "But didn't he leave you, as you allege in your complaint, on the date mentioned therein?"

"No, sir; I left him. I wouldn't live with such a man."

"Hadn't you better take a continuance?" suggested the court, sympathetically, as he glanced at the rows of grinning lawyers in the rear. The young barrister eagerly adopted the suggestion, and walked out with his client, looking very crestfallen. A veteran attorney took pity on him and followed him into the corridor.

"Wasn't that awful," said the young attorney.

"Yes, it was pretty tough," assented the other, "but don't you know that it's desertion on the husband's part if by his cruel acts he compelled his wife to leave him?"

The young attorney didn't know, but he was very much pleased to learn that such was the case, and he thanked his instructor for the information.

The Lucky Bruguieres

Fortune has been smiling on the Bruguiere family lately. They sold a mine in the northern part of the State for more than a million dollars, and Emil has made a lot of money out of oil wells in Dakota. Besides he has had his opera accepted by the Bostonians. The opera is to be tried on the dog in some Middle West town, and then if it has merit it will be taken to New York. The marriage day of Vesta Shortridge and Emil Bruguiere has, I hear, been again postponed. Louis Bruguiere has been making conquest after conquest in Newport, and is said to be a pet of Mrs. Astor, and Pedar Bruguiere is about the only member of the family who hasn't been distinguishing himself. But he has shed his luxuriant locks and now he looks like an ordinary mortal.

Will Irwin and Gelett Burgess have collaborated on a novel which has a distinctively new plot. The main story deals with a California flower fiesta in which, just previous to the coronation, the queen disappears, and her maid of honor is crowned in her stead. There are plots and counterplots, half earnest and half mockery, with a bit of real mystery surrounding the disappearance of the queen. In every chapter one of the characters relates a story, which, though complete in itself, bears a vital relation to the main romance. These flower fiestas have given such a chance to exploit modern chivalry and romance that the wonder is some one has not utilized them before.

They Can Smoke Again

After a theoretical abstinence of over a score of years from the solace of nicotine, the West Point cadets are to have the privilege of tobacco-smoking restored to them, and I understand that the Annapolis midshipmen will be similarly favored before long. Smoking was prohibited in the academies in 1881, prior to which date the sturdy pipe, the fragrant cigar and the dainty cigarette furnished soothing relief from the arduous work of those institutions. The average age of a cadet or a midshipman is about twenty years. To deprive him of the privilege of smoking was always considered by the students as a high-handed bit of paternalism. Many a cadet has acquired a formidable array of demerits for violation of the anti-smoking regulations and his conduct has thus been made to appear bad for doing something which nearly all youths, especially students, do without punishment. And many a good officer has been compelled to leave the academy because of the demerits accruing from his infractions of the onerous restriction.

An Industrious Naval Officer

I am sorry to learn of the serious illness of Lieutenant-Commander John B. Blish, U. S. Navy, who has been relieved of his duties as executive officer of the training ship Alert and sent to the Mare Island hospital for treatment. John Blish is one of many naval officers who do not content themselves with the mere routine duties of their ranks. Many people think that an officer in the Navy has a pretty easy thing of it in time of peace, and so he has—in the leisure moments off duty when lying in port entertaining guests. That is about the only side of it that the average visitor sees. But social affairs do not occupy all the time of the naval officer. He spends much of his time in hard study, not only to keep up with the advances in his profession but in seeking to better the equipment of the service. Blish is one of the energetic sort. He has recently made two notable additions to the navigator's outfit, one of which, known as "the navigator's prism," eliminates one of the most annoying sources of error in navigation, and is greeted as a boon by seamen the world over. Nor is Blish by any means alone among the naval officers who have thus turned their leisure moments to the profit of their fellow sailors.

One of the Real Heroes

While the marital incidents in the life of Doctor Blue follow in quick succession, I am reminded of the calm that hovers nowadays about his brother, Lieutenant Victor Blue, of the Navy, the man who performed one of the most daring, sensational deeds of the Spanish war in his lone reconnaissance around Santiago. Blue is a modest hero, and a real one. He is unlike the spectacular, gallery-playing Hobson, who did perform a gallant deed, and Schley, who did not. While these two were filling the columns of the press, exchanging greetings with the throng, and otherwise exploiting themselves, Blue remained silent in comparative obscurity, and attended quietly to his business, as though he had never done anything out of the ordinary.

They Salute "Captain Bill"

Up at Fort Flagler the idol of the post is the little son of the Percy Kesslers (Lottie Cunningham). The little fellow is known as "Captain Bill" and he is full of military spirit, which he gets from two lines of ancestors. All the warships that come into the harbor know "Captain Bill" and never fail to give him the salute.

The Captain's Romance

Captain Arthur Stewart Conklin, who was recently married and who is soon to be stationed at the Presidio, figured in a romance a few years ago that supplied army circles with an entertaining topic for discussion. Conklin was a lieutenant then, and stationed at Ponce, Porto Rico. He began a flirtation with a beautiful native girl, Carmen Antonsanti, which was only pour passer le temps on his part but which the passionate Porto Rican took more seriously. When the lieutenant was ordered away, the Ponce beauty followed him to New York, thence to Washington and other cities, never however succeeding in overtaking him. Tiring of the fruitless pursuit Carmen returned home and some months later married a native widower with a family.

Service Gossip

There is a rumor to the effect that the Thirtieth Infantry is to be stationed at the Presidio. As some of the officers have been on duty here before they would be warmly welcomed back. The regiment is on its way home from the Philippines and is almost due. General MacArthur, who is on tour of inspection in Southern California accompanied by Mrs. MacArthur, is expected back next week. General Robert M. O'Reilly of the Medical Department has been spending the week here and has been extensively entertained by his brother officers. He was accompanied from the East by Major William C. Borden. Colonel W. S. Patten is expected to arrive from the East the end of next week to assume the duties of chief quartermaster of the Department of California. Colonel Palmer H. Ray, Fourth Infantry, and Mrs. Ray, left for Manila on the Logan last Saturday. Major J. M. T. Partello, late of the Seventh Infantry, will join the Twenty-ninth Infantry at Fort Niobrara, Nebraska, instead of the Fifteenth Infantry at Monterey, as was expected. Captain Austin F. Prescott, Twenty-first Infantry, has been ordered to Fort Lincoln, North Dakota, where he will be accompanied by Mrs. Prescott. They expected to go to Fort Snelling. Major George O. Squier, chief signal officer of the Department of California, has gone East, where he will pass his two months' leave. Captain and Mrs. Langdon (Ruth Dunham), who have been abroad since their marriage, arrived a few days ago and are in quarters at the Presidio. Captain Charles W. Exton, Twentieth Infantry, has received orders to leave Monterey, where he has been stationed with the Fifteenth Infantry for some months past and on special duty with the rifle competition at Benicia Barracks, and proceed to West Point to resume the duties of instructor.

Lieutenant and Mrs. G. W. Winterburn have gone to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. Lieutenant Winterburn has been ordered to attend the General Service and Staff College there.

Mr. Louis Eaton will resume the series of organ recitals at Trinity church on Thursday evening, September seventeenth, at eight o'clock. The program at the seventeenth recital will be Fugue in G major, book ix, Bach; Concert Overture in E flat, Faulkes; Seventh Sonata (new), Guilmant; Caprice, Wolstenholme; overture, Tannhauser, Wagner.

Wanted: A Cook

A PARVENUE'S STRENUOUS EFFORTS TO SECURE A COOK, AS BETRAYED BY HER LETTERS.

Letter to Mrs. Hannah O'Hara, of the Ready Rèliable Employment Agency.

Monday.

Mrs. Hannah O'Hara—Dear Madam,

I understand that you can furnish me a cook. Before placing the order, however, would say that we are extremely fastidious, my husband and I, and that your task will not be an easy one. A girl, you know, that would please ordinarily, would for us prove quite incompetent. Trusting, however, that you will be able to surmount this difficulty, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

Mrs. Arthur Henry Leslie Jones.

Tuesday.

Dear Mrs. O'Hara,

I wrote you yesterday, but owing to the press of social engagements, did not take time enough to tell you exactly what I wanted. We like German girls, with a decided preference to blondes. The girl we employ must be neat and willing, of tractable disposition and not to be given to sulks. She must, of course, be strictly virtuous and under no circumstances will we tolerate beaux. That she must be a good cook goes without saying—preferably a cooking-school graduate.

She may have one night out every two weeks. Or if she prefers that night in, she may entertain her friends in the coal cellar.

As to wages, we are very rich as you doubtless know, so will be able to pay anything for—say, an A-1 girl.

Please let me hear from you at once.

Mrs. Jones.

Wednesday.

Mrs. O'Hara,

Don't send a dressy girl, please—that is, one who has any aspirations above frilled aprons and gingham gowns. And, too, see that her hair doesn't pompadour.

She must, of course, be graceful, Mrs. O'Hara, especially, now, about entering and leaving the dining-room; not inclined to sliding the parsley into the gravy, don't you know.

Have I covered the ground, and will you send me a cook at once?

Yours very much, Mrs. Jones.

P. S.—Don't send more than one girl at a time, please.

Thursday.

Dear Madam,

I have written you three times and telephoned you twice. What on earth can be the matter?

Do you realize what an honor I'm conferring upon you—I, Mrs. Arthur Henry Leslie Jones? Why, my very name on your order book is prestige enough! I trust you appreciate this fact and will send me a cook at once.

The Jones millions, too, are not to be sneezed at. I shall pay you handsomely for your trouble. Mrs. J....

Monday.

Dear Mrs. O'Hara,

I got your letter by the very first mail today. How horrid of you! Hard to find, you say, can't fill the bill, and don't want the job anyhow? Why, Mrs. O'Hara! Now, there, just to think of such a thing! Make an extra effort in my behalf—now do. Think what a card it would be for you to be able to say you furnished a cook for Mrs. Arthur Henry Leslie Jones!

Thanking you in advance, I am

Very gratefully yours, Mrs. Jones.

Wednesday.

Mrs. O'Hara,

I'm almost crazy. I've been ringing you up for an hour. What is the matter with you, anyhow? Are you absolutely inidfferent to the appeals I am daily, almost hourly, making you? Don't you know I need your sympathy, and need it badly? In addition, my dear Mrs. O'Hara, to the absence of a cook, I am now sans housemaid, sans coachman, sans nursegirl, sans everything. Think of me if you can—Mrs. Arthur Henry Leslie Jones—in this palace of a home without a piece of a servant left. Arthur Henry Leslie says, too, that my cooking would kill a mule; and as for baby, he's had just one spell of colic after another until I'm—.

There's the door bell now, Mrs. O'Hara, and the baby's crying, and the steak's burning, and the telephone's ringing. Whatever—shall I—do?

Don't like what I said about beaux? Will take it all back—every single line. She can have a dozen beaux—she can entertain them in the parlor—she can have the reception hall, and the Turkish room, and the library, and the smoker, and Arthur Henry Leslie, if she wants him—the horses, too. The place is hers! Any color, any nationality, —just any old thing, Mrs. O'Hara, but for God's sake send her.

Mrs. Jones.

STAGE

The Massive Benedetto

On the whole the Tivoli grand opera company is a very well-balanced organization, and it contains several good singers. It also contains a very attractive woman in the ample person of Lina de Benedetto, who is really large enough for the Chutes. When you see her you get a great deal for your money. The critics of the dailies say that she is roly-poly; she is more than that—she is huge, the greatest Aida you ever saw. She has voice, too, and she knows how to use it, but when she falls or faints one trembles for the tenor who has to lift her. Grand opera requires a deal of imagination but de Benedetto makes the well run dry. She turns tragedy into comedy.

A Marguerite Without Temperament

There is atmosphere on both sides of the footlights at the Tivoli nowanights, for the singers from sunny Italy are once more regaling the Latin colony of San Francisco. But the representatives of the Latin colony are not the only enthusiasts that quench their musical thirst in the local temple of melody. Italian opera has a great fascination for local music lovers of all nationalities, and so grateful are they to the Tivoli management for gratifying them, that they are disinclined to be captious. On Monday night of this week they heard Signorina Tina de Spada sing Marguerite in "Faust," and they could not have manifested much greater satisfaction if it had been Melba in the role. The Signorina is an artist, but she is no Marguerite. That is one role which demands the quality of temperament with which this talented young woman is not endowed. She is one of the most pleasing and accomplished lyric sopranos that ever sang in Italian opera at popular prices in this city, but as Marguerite she is painfully unreal. The sensuousness of the Gounod music is never expressed by her, either in voice or manner. Her singing of the jewel song was colorless, and the whole garden scene was lacking inpoetry and passion. The ability to produce limpid notes is not the alpha and omega of artistic vocalization. Signorina de Spada proved herself a Marguerite of adequate comeliness, grace and simplicity of manner, and while she sang with great purity she failed to catch the spirit of the role. There was missing the true note of childish ecstasy at finding the jewels, and of the subsequent feeling of alarm that she is, perhaps, doing wrong. The gradual awakening to the power of love, and finally the unspeakable agony of sorrow and temptation, are themes beyond her powers of portrayal. True to operatic and dramatic tradition, the Signorina wore the hay-rope braid down her back to proclaim her Margueriteishness. Patti, whose complexion was of the same shade as this young Italian, had the courage to break away from tradition in that role. She looked like herself, with her own black hair braided down her back, and I always thought she should have been congratulated for doing so. The most satisfactory feature of the performance of "Faust" was the spirited singing and acting of Agosto Dado. This virile basso plays the devil as though he revels in the role, and his singing, despite the notes of the lower register that go to protest, has the full, deep-toned resonance that delights the ear and stirs the emotions. Mephisto is one of his impersonations, grimly sardonic, yet with brilliant touches of humor. Agostini is singing with even greater purity than his lusty tenor possessed last season, but he seems to lack inspiration in "Faust." Perhaps he needs a more responsive Marguerite.

Floral Pieces at Fischers

The bill at Fischer's was changed Monday night, and as usual on the opening night of new productions at the burlesque house many floral pieces were passed over the footlights. The florist business would be stimulated greatly if there was a change of bill once a week at Fischer's. The new burlesques are "The Glad Hand" and "The Con-Querors." They are bubbling over with nonsense and they are as melodious as any of their predecessors. Kolb, Dill and Bernard are the principal fun-makers, and Winfield Blake and Maude Amber contribute the serio-comic features, and the most pretentious of the songs, while Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson entertain with their fantastic terpsichorean stunts. The new burlesques are very amusing, and are interspersed with some sparkling dialogue. The chorus is as busy as ever, and there has been no diminution in the number of shapely girls.

Not Margaret but Lizzie

The little children of the poor who appear in the May-day park scene of "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" at the Alcazar are the real, real thing. There is a boisterous realism in their merry-making, but artistic results were not attained without much sacrifice of stage director Butler's time and patience. One frowsy, tousle-headed Miss of eleven was particularly trying at rehearsals by her persistent attempts to monopolize the centre of the stage. Finally the usually serene and mild-spoken Butler became irritated. "I say, Margaret Anglin," he remarked sarcastically, "get back in the bunch and don't spoil the situation." Thereupon the freckle-faced brother of the refractory one bridled up and made haughty and ferocious reply: "Aw say, her name's not Margaret Anglin; it's Lizzie Foley."

Victor Hugo in Drama

The Paul Potter version of "Notre Dame," though not so effective as the one Margaret Mather used, was sufficiently moving to draw large audiences to the California this week, to the end of its run. MacVicars is by no means at his best as Quasimodo. It takes an actor of peculiar intensity to play a role that must inspire alternate repulsion and attraction, to be true to the author's creation. Wyngate, late of the Alcazar stock, is fairly in the spirit of Phoebus, but Miss Andrews does not put the right French touch to Fleur-le-Lys. The gypsy is played by Miss Kemble, who succeeds in retaining the audience's sympathies from the opening scene to her sad death. Oberle as the priest and Sumner as the poet are particularly well cast.

The little Pollards are doing a banner business at the Grand. "A Gaiety Girl" goes with lots of vim and Daphne Pollard as Lady Virginia Forrest is amazingly clever. Fred Pollard's songs are a feature of the production. The patriotic ballad, "When Old Glory Waves," sung by Alice Pollard with the chorus, arouses enthusiasm and Jack Pollard's "Sally in the Ballet" is bright.

A Good Stock

The change from melodrama to lively farce came very appropriately at the Central this week. "Whose Baby Are You?" is sprightly enough for a Manhattan Beach attraction, and the company seems to enjoy this brief rest from heavy work. The Central, by the way, has a remarkably strong stock company just now, and it is hard to say where it could be in any way bettered. Miss Lawton is a handsome and magnetic woman. She hails from the South, I believe, and has lots of temperament. She came to San Francisco with the Frawleys, but has now been for some months at the Central. Herschel Mayall is one of the most popular and versatile leading actors we have ever had here. Edwin Emery is a very clever comedian and "all round" actor. Ernest Howell excels in character roles. Henry Shumer's villains are above par. Miss Vane is a bright and charming soubrette, who never thrusts her personality forward to an unpleasant degree, but acts with discretion. The others in the company, which is a large one, were chosen for their all-round ability, and George Webster is an admirable stage director.

There's a French bull at the Chutes this week which is cleverer than many humans. Though the canine is a debutant, he acts with the aplomb of an old stager. He does high and low jumps, goes through hoops and punches a bag. He will likely be a hit on the circuit and acquire shekels for his master, who is also a remarkable high leaper.

The new Alcazar stock company, engaged in New York for Belasco and Mayer by general manager E. D. Price, will open the regular fall and winter season October twelfth, in a powerful Pinero play that has never been seen in this city.

Arthur Donaldson, who made a great hit in the original production of "The Prince of Pilsen," appears here with the organization which also includes the celebrated Trixie Friganza. This will be the first appearance here of this actress, of whom so much has been read and heard. Nick Long and Idaline Cotton have splendid parts in the comedy.

Society Supes in Salt Lake

When Henry Miller tried "The Devil's Disciple" on the canine, it Salt Lake City, it so happened that the McCornicks, leaders of society there, were giving a ball on the same night. Miss Mamie Read, one of the Salt Lake belles, was anxious to see the play, but she could not bear to forego the dance. Louis Nethersole, however, managed the matter for Miss Read. George Topliff, a prominent clubman and cotillion beau of Salt Lake, knows Nethersole, and he begged the latter to permit Miss Read and himself to attend the dress rehearsal of the Shaw play. Henry Miller's orders are very strict about non-admittance of outsiders at rehearsals, but Nethersole suggested that his society friends engage as supers in the mob scene in the last act. Miss Read and Mr. Topliff agreed, and were in the dress rehearsal, seeing the play from the inside, but Mr. Miller did not know two of his supers were from smart society; not until afterwards when Nethersole told the story to a newspaperman and it was passed around.

Theatre-goers have a great treat in store for them, for Ben Hur will be here in November. Over one thousand performances of this play have already been given in this country and its third year's run inNew York will shortly commence. It has been slow in reaching this city because it is such a big production. Its settings will tax the capacity of the Grand Opera House stage. It is said to be a drama in every sense worthy of the great novel from which it was taken. Of course the great feature of the play is the chariot scene, which is presented by means of panoramic stage settings, the horses running on treadmills. The incidental music, by the way, was written by our Edgar Stillman Kelley.

"Kronstadt," in which Effie Shannon and Kerbert Kelcey will appear next season, is a dramatization of Max Pemberton's novel. It is an exciting tale of how a woman secured the secret of the fortifications, and should make a strong play.

Paul Arthur, Mrs. Langtry's leading man, was once the husband of Katherine Gray, of San Francisco, who later married Jack Mason.

The Alcazar's special Matinee performance of D'Annunzio's "Gioconda" by Florence Roberts and company was too late for criticism in this week's issue.

The Latest in Press Notices

Formerly actresses and actors were press-agented; press agents now devote some of their space to themselves, judging by this, in my Monday mail-bag:

"A recent addition to the Liebler & Co. forces which will attract unusual attention in newspaper circles throughout the United States, is that of Mr. Frank C. Reid, who for the past twelve years has been conspicuously connected with the dramatic department of the New York Herald and for the greater part of that time recognized as Mr. Thomas W. White's right-hand man, and main reliance, his mantle falling upon Mr. Reid's shoulders during Mr. White's temporary absences, and especially during that gentleman's occasional sojourns abroad. There are few better known, more thoroughly capable, or more universally beloved newspaper men in America than Frank Reid, and while the New York newspaper boys will greatly miss him, yet they will all be glad to know that he has been permitted to escape the irksomeness of all-night work on a big city daily, the wear and tear of which is terrible, even under the most pleasant surroundings. As an evidence of the regard felt for him in the Herald editorial rooms, Mr. Reid now carries a handsome and artistic cane, the metal head of which bears an inscription which Mr. Reid prizes very highly, as it constitutes an evidence of esteem and affection and regret at separation which, as the reward of long and faithful service, is ever held priceless. Mr. Reid will have charge of the press work for Miss Eleanor Robson's tour."

Miss Eleanor Haber's monologue recital will occur on September twenty-ninth. All new monologues, most of them especially written for the occasion, will be given.

A store in which Richard Mansfield worked as a clerk before he went on the stage is pointed out to visitors as one of the sights of Boston.

It is said M. Coquelin wants to come over to America and found a conservatory to teach American actors and actresses how to act.

Christie McDonald (Mrs. Willie Winter Jefferson) will appear in a new piece by Seymour Hicks, "The English Daisy," in October.

Agnes Mahr is a New York girl who is being much discussed because she can cakewalk on her toes. Arnold Grazer of this city was, I believe, the first to introduce the toe-dance cakewalk.

Tyndall's Psychic Evening a Feature

It begins to look as though we will soon discover that we are each and all electrical machines, and that if electricity does not run the universe, at least it supplies the motive power for doing so. At Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's Sunday evening lectures and demonstrations of psychic power, this theory is receiving substantial proof in the manner with which the electrical force of thought is transmitted from one mind to another. The lecture last Sunday night was given by Dr. Albert J. Atkins, at the invitation of Tyndall, the subject being "Human Electricity." The discourse was a scientific exposition of his theory of electro-chemic energy as the life principle, and was well received by the large audience. Dr. Atkins paid a high tribute to Dr. Tyndall, saying that he deserves the co-operation and support of every person of advanced thought, for the pioneer work he has done in bringing to the world the great truths that are at present receiving attention. After the lecture Tyndall presented some of the experiments in thought-force which have made him world-renowned. Tomorrow evening Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will again lecture at Steinway hall, on "Divorce: Its Relation to Psychology," and on the Sunday

Features of Next Week's Bills

For the last week of their season at the Columbia Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin will appear in an adaptation of George Ohnet's love story, "Le Maitre des Forges," entitled "The Aftermath." Henry Miller prepared the dramatization for the stage. The play will be superbly staged. Miller as the ironmaster should prove highly effective in the many strong scenes afforded by the play. Miss Anglin as Claire promises to make an even greater success than she has yet achieved here. There will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. "The Prince of Pilsen" comes next.

Many famous women of the stage have essayed Sudermann's "Magda"; it will be interesting to study Florence Roberts's conception for she is, above all else, a brainy actress, with splendid command of all the artifices of the stage. Although she has given "Magda" many times on tour she has never played it in San Francisco. There are those reviewers who have placed Miss Roberts's "Magda" even higher in the artistic scale than her fervid and sweepingly passionate "Zaza." Next Thursday afternoon will be given the second of the special "Gioconda" matinees, an undertaking carried out in rare artistic spirit. These performances of the famous D'Annunzio play are of the highest intellectual value and are notable as the first ever given by an English-speaking actress. To follow, September twenty-first, is Anthony Hope's charming romance, "The Adventure of the Lady Ursula."

"The Lady Slavey," which the little Pollards will produce at the Grand on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights, will be remembered as having been given by the Southwell opera company. It is a very bright musical comedy. Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights and Saturday matinee "The Geisha" will be given. The production will be a unique one. All the scenery was painted by a Japanese artist in the town of Kobe, Japan, while the company was touring that country. The costumes were also made there. Alice Pollard will be the Geisha, Oscar Heintz, the Marquis, Connie Pollard the French maid and Daphne Pollard Mollie Seymour. Attention is called to the fact that the only matinees will be given on Saturdays and Sundays, and that at each of them souvenir pictures of the Lilliputians will be presented to all the ladies and children in the audience.

At the Tivoli will be given "Il Trovatore" and "La Somnambula," which will almost be new to San Francisco, it not having been produced for some time. In "Il Trovatore" Ischierdo will appear as Manrico and Gregoretti as Count di Luna. Travaglini will sing Ferrando, De Benedetto Leonora and Marchesini Azucena. In "Somnambula" Dado is to have the role of Count Rodolfo with Tedeschi as Elvino. Tromben will be Amina and Marie Welsh will sing Lisa.

Fischer's new bill has caught on with vigor and will go all next week.

"The Cherry Pickers," at the Central, is the work of Joseph Arthur, who wrote those money-winning melodramas, "Blue Jeans, "Still Alarm" and "Lost River." It ran for one hundred and twenty consecutive nights at the Fourteenth street theatre, New York. "The Cherry Pickers" is the nickname of an English regiment in India, so called on account of their red trousers. The insurrection of the Eurasians and the British-Afghan war of '78-'80 figure in the drama. There is a powerful plot in which figure a British officer, a half-caste and a beautiful Eurasian girl. The piece will be staged with the accuracy and splendor for which the Central is noted.

E. Rousby, who comes direct from the principal European amusement centres, will present for the first time in this country at the Orpheum his latest spectacular novelty, "In Paris," consisting of an electrical review in four tableaux showing the most interesting features of Parisian life during the Exposition of 1900. The first tableau shows the main entrance to the grounds, by day and night, the second represents a Swiss village during a thunderstorm, the third is entitled "The Palace of Illusions," and the fourth portrays a night festival in front of the Chateau d'Eau. Arnesen, the incomparable gymnast, also comes direct from Europe. James Richmond Glenroy, "the man with the green gloves," returns after several seasons' absence with an automobile full of original stories and parodies. The Princess Losoros, a prima donna of royal lineage, will sing for the first time in this city, her selections including popular and classical numbers. The biograph, which has been resting for two weeks, will show a complete change of motion pictures.

At the Chutes will be John LeClair, the artistic and refined comedy juggler, Anderson and Wallace, travesty artists of renown, appearing here for the first time, as will also Henry Clive, an Australian magician, with several novelties from the Antipodes. George Schindler, the world's greatest harmonica player, will play operatic and classical selections on his seldom-heard instrument, and Mr. and Mrs. Morton will present a unique comedy sketch. The Reese brothers, gun and spear manipulators and May Lamson, the contralto, in new illustrated songs, will remain.

Automobile Topics

It is gradually dawning upon the farmer that the horseless carriage is a pretty good thing. It stimulates an interest in roads, and causes agitation in favor of improving the suburban highways. As a consequence even the man who drives horses is getting over his prejudice against the horseless vehicles. He and the farmers are beginning to realize that the influence making for improved highways is for their benefit. It will be easier to get crops to market when the country is opened up, and the heavy roads are metamorphosed into smooth ones where going is easy, winter and summer. So after all the horseless carriage is beneficial to the general public as well as to those fortunate persons who can afford to keep their own devil wagons.

On August twenty-third C. C. Eib of the Pioneer Automobile Company left this city in a Stevens-Duryea, for the express purpose of proving the worth and enduring qualities of that horseless carriage. Mr. Eib spent six days in touring the northern portion of the State. After reaching Stockton the local automobilist, with W. W. Westy and Fred M. West, cashier and president respectively of the Stockton Savings Bank, and W. Hansel of the firm of Merrill and Hansel, left on a run from the Terminal City to Modesto. This trip, covering thirty-five miles of some of the worst sand in the State, was made in two hours and six minutes. From Modesto the return trip to Stockton was made by way of Oakdale, which is a longer but much better route. This distance of forty-seven and three-quarters miles was covered in the remarkable time of two hours and six minutes. A few days later, accompanied by Messrs. John Woods, Smith Woods and W. H. Woods, a distance of eighteen and one-quarter miles (from the former's ranch from Stockton), was made in fifty-four minutes. On the return trip to Stockton through Woodbridge, a distance of twenty miles, the elapsed time was one hour and thirteen minutes. Five miles on this trip, over a good road, were made in exactly thirteen minutes. On Friday, August twenty-eighth, Mr. Eib, accompanied by Mr. Hansel, drove the Duryea from Stockton to Sacramento, a distance of fifty-three miles, in two house and twenty minutes, while the return trip was made in one hour and fifty minutes.

Mr. Eib, in speaking about his trip, said that Stockton was becoming quite an automobile town and that already fifty-five of the horseless vehicles are in use. They are chiefly Wintons, Knox's, Oldsmobiles and Locomobiles.

In connection with the placing of a recent order of one hundred automobiles with a Michigan factory, by a Los Angeles dealer, a good story is told at the expense of a Detroit justice. The Los Angeles man, Fred Stamm, who placed the order for the Southern California firm, was making a test run of one of machines when he was gathered in by the police and charged with scorching in a public street in the residence section. When he was placed on trial he set up the defense that he was trying a machine of Detroit manufacture and did not realize the speed he was making. He added that the trial was so satisfactory that he had given an order for one hundred machines. The police judge looked wise, thought hard for a few minutes and then rendered the opinion "that a Los Angeles man, a Californian, a man with money to buy one hundred auto runabouts, was entitled to some latitude in Michigan." He then dismissed the case against Mr. Stamm and proceeded to the next on the docket. By a singular coincidence, there was also a case of scorching against a son of Governor Pingree, but as he was not from Los Angeles in California he was fined twenty-five dollars and costs, which he paid.

It is something new in the automobile world to pace a trotting horse with an automobile. An automobile running mate presents a feature which few people have ever thought of, and yet why should not an automobile be used for such a purpose? Arrangements have been made to have one of the most famous trotting horses of the country, Croesus, paced in his trials against time this fall by the "White" Steam Touring Car. One difficulty of achieving satisfactory results with a running mate is that it is difficult to rate him along in proper time and to put just the requisite spurt into his work at the proper moment; and yet a good, speedy automobile could do this work perfectly. The silent, noiseless motion of the "White"; its condensor which takes up exhaust steam, and the great speed the "White" car has shown, all insure the success of the plan.

On a recent trip to Portland, Mr. C. A. Hawkins, manager of the White Sewing Machine Company, established a new record over the worst grade in Oregon. The run over three miles to Portland Heights was made in a White touring car in nine minutes flat. The previous record was thiry-three minutes.

Quite a few horseless vehicles have been disposed of by local automobile dealers the last week or so. J. C. Ainsworth, president of the United States National Bank of Portland, has bought a "White" touring car, J. Brock Jr. of Lodi a Stevens-Duryea, Dr. E. H. Parker of Portland a White touring car, Albert Moore of Stockton a Stevens-Duryea, W. B. Ayre, president of the Eastern and Western Lumber Company of Portland, a "White" touring car, Henry Nichols of Oakland an Autocar, Joe Eastland a Peerless and P. George Gow has ordered a Knox touring car.

The new Edison battery has been perfected and will be placed on the market in about one month. The Waverly electrical machine is equipped with this battery, and Mr. Cuyler Lee of the Western Automobile Company has secured the agency for this machine. A great many people of California have long been waiting for the arrival of an electrical machine equipped with such a battery, and I predict that within a short time these machines will be seen in numbers on the streets of the city and roads of suburban towns. An electrical vehicle equipped with the Edison battery will run one hundred miles on one charge; thus it will be seen that a person making the run from San Francisco to Oakland via San Jose can do so without any bother or inconvenience.

Mr. John Rush Baird and Dr. Louis C. Deane of San Francisco and Dr. D. E. Blackburn of Pescadero have purchased Cadillacs.

The first and only passenger bus ever brought to this coast is soon to arrive. It was ordered by the National Automobile Company. The vehicle will be put in service in this city and can seat twenty persons. —The Chauffeur.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Scheel Symphony

By far the most satisfactory program that Scheel has given us was the one presented on Tuesday last. Beginning with Wagner's inspiring Kaiser March it went with great spirit to the end. Scheel has done wonders with his orchestra in the short time that he has been with us, until now the ensemble is about perfect. Every part of the program was beautifully shaded and there was a refreshing absence of slovenly playing. The piece de resistance was of course the Dvorak symphony, "From the New World." This beautiful work has been given here only a few times, and never so well as by Scheel. Dvorak's composition has steadily grown in popular favor since its first rendition a few years ago. Now it is always a favorite on every program both in America and Europe. Handel's "Grand Concerto" followed and its rare classic beauty was exquisitely brought out. The trio in the fourth part for two violins and ine cello was skilfully and delicately given and was so well received that it had to be repeated. Hector Berlioz's "Dance of the Sylphs" from the "Damnation of Faust," a dainty trifle, was well handled and was enthusiastically encored. Godard's mazourka, "Ancients and Moderns," proved to be a beautiful work. The program closed with the ever lovely "Mignon" overture.

The Leader Who Lasts

In music, as in every art, the pleasure-giving effects of mere brilliancy are in inverse ratio to repetition. Brilliancy creates but a one day's wonder. The first hearing delights you, the second leaves you indifferent, the third bores you to death. With mastery, on the contrary, the effects are cumulative. Beethoven heard for the hundredth time is more beautiful than when first heard. The true test of him who reads the music, as of him who writes it, is time. Few leaders last the season out. One of the few is Fritz Scheel. Those who now question that opinion are, for the most part, disgruntled musicians. The difficult task of maintaining a high standard of art and at the same time meeting popular demands Mr. Scheel performs with admirable grace. Tuesday's program was a good example of his method. The Handel "Grand Concerto" gave us the same Fritz Scheel that led the Schubert last week, the Fritz Scheel that endures. Therein was to be heard the rare note of "distinction." Music to suit any man's ear was to be found in Anton Dvorak's "The New World Symphonie," and the audience was mighty desirous of having "Faust" damned all over again. The "Kaiser March" is by no means the best of Wagner, but the wise leader made the best of it.

Our Child Artist

Nothing, not even reading the biographies of the great deathless dead, is more beautifully fascinating than watching the development of a young artist. And Kathleen Parlow is a young artist. She is not a child wonder. Her destiny is to grow into an adult artist. Unhappily child wonders have a far other fate in store for them. Had the word genius not been so abused, its noble features so disfigured, I might be tempted to apply it to her. On the evening of Thursday, September 17, in Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, she will give a violin recital and the public will have an opportunity of deciding what word best befits her exquisite artistry. Miss Parlow is but twelve years old, yet the program includes Schwedische Tanze (Max Bruch), the Paganini Capriccio in A minor, and the big Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor. Mrs. M. E. Blanchard will sing, and Mr. Fred Maurer will be at the piano.

The departure of Mrs. Grace Morei Dickman for New York last week removes from our midst one of our very best contraltos. Mrs. Dickman, had she conquered her disinclination toward a stage life, could long since have made name and fame in opera, but she prefers to sing in concert and oratorio.

The Controversy Over Parsifal

As soon as Manager Conreid, the successor to Maurice Grau, determined to produce Wagner's great opera, "Parsifal," at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, a great storm of objections swept over the ocean from Bayreuth. Conreid was denounced as a mercenary creature who had no respect for the wishes of the dead or the noble sentiments of the living. It was known that the great master desired that "Parsifal" should never be produced outside Bayreuth, and that his widow and son had firmly resolved that his will should be obeyed. But Conreid and his friends, and even the New York papers, attributed their objections to mercenary motives. They said that the widow and the management of the opera house in Bayreuth kept "Parsifal" for home production in order to attract rich people to that city and extort fancy prices from them. But there are two sides to the story. Frau Wagner's legal representative has arrived in America intent upon preventing the production of the opera and he tells the Wagner side of the story. To an occasional correspondent in New York he said that Frau Wagner has never made one cent from the productions at Bayreuth, a fact that is easily susceptible of positive proof. As a matter of fact she has been robbed right and left, for the Wagnerian operas have been stolen and royalties are seldom paid. Frau Wagner is not a business woman. She has devoted herself to carrying out Herr Wagner's wishes. Nothing has been changed in the big house at Bayreuth since he died. The very books on the library table remain as he left them. To Frau Wagner the production of "Parsifal" outside of Bayreuth seems a sacrilege. The opera is a sacred drama embodying the sacred story of the Holy Grail and in it appear Christ and his disciples. It should be produced in a proper atmosphere with religious devotion. It should not be put on as a money-making scheme. There is the same objection to its falling into the hands of the commercial manager as there is to the production of the Passion Play for revenue. Frau Wagner's legal representative says that she will be heartbroken if this great religious play of her husband gets into the hands of the money-grabbers and that he intends to defeat them.

So many of Mr. Emil Steinegger's pupils living across the bay have desired to have their lessons at his home that Mr. Steinegger has decided to teach in Fruitvale, but in the forenoons only.

There is already demand for reservation for seats and boxes for the Patti concerts, not alone from this city but nearly every city in the State.

The Paris Gaulois credits Pietro Mascagni with the remarkable feat of simultaneously beginning the composition of four grand operas, the books by prominent Italian librettists. The titles given are "Vestilia," "Stella," "Frou Frou" and "Marie Antoinette." —The Music Critic.

Only the first pressings of the best grapes of the choicest vineyards in the champagne district are used by Messrs. G. H. Mumm & Co. To insure themselves against the poorer vintages they always purchase very largely of the fine ones, not confining themselves to the product of a limited number of vineyards. It is the great skill in the composition of their cuves in combining quality, purity and natural dryness that gives their champagne its world-wide pre-eminence.

A New Juvenile

"Andy Barr" falls a long way short of being an ideal boys' book, though the intention is good and there are many good things in it. It starts well, with that delight of boys of all ages and climes, the arrival of the circus, and there are plenty of wholesome adventures. The story is located in Illinois at the breaking out of the Civil war and extends to its close. Andy Barr, the principal character, is one of the class without whom no story of rural life would be complete in these days, and in the main he is well enough. He is the village cobbler, and is a veteran of the Mexican war, having lost his leg in one of the battles, and is called "Uncle Andy" by the boys, whom he regales with stories, songs, and bits of wisdom. Naturally all the boys become excited when the declaration of hostilities is made, and they are all eager to enlist. "Uncle Andy" does them a good turn in giving them drill instructions, and teaching them the military value of an order and a promise. The youngsters are as serious about it all as children always are in their play, and eventually their juvenile battalions are sworn in as home guards and some of the older boys do enlist for regular service. Andy Barr is the soul of truth and honesty, and so far, good. When in the sequel it develops that the apparently impecunious cobbler is really a rich man who has been hoarding his wealth; that he was a malingerer who feigned insanity in order to be discharged from the army, though he was shamed into enlisting again under another name and redeeming himself, and that during the years while he has been posing to the boys as a miracle of honor and modesty, he has been all the time collecting a pension that he did not need, from the government, one is fain to consider that the author, Willis B. Hawkins, might have done better by his hero. Andy Barr is the son of people in comfortable circumstances, who had not felt it incumbent upon himself to do anything especial in the way of earning a livelihood in his young days. His principal occupation is writing poetry to the girls, so one has a natural right to expect better and more grammatical English from him, as well as abstention from profanity, for the example to the boys. It is doubtful if boys of the age of Fred and Jimmy, at the beginning of the story, would have been so easily imposed on by the burlesque enlistment and swearing in by Corporal Maginnis, or that they would be simple enough to think their old horse and cow were also mustered into the service of the United States, and it is very certain that the little lads who would be entranced by the story of the Widget, the Curleykew, and the other quaint fancies, would not care at all for the love story with which the book winds up. Neither is it at all probable that Andy Barr would have been able to enlist such a company as the he is credited with, or that he would lead them into battle on foot—literally on foot for him, since he had but one. A good juvenile story is the rarest thing to be found in contemporary literature. Mr. Hawkins has done exceptionally well in places but he evidently forgets that boys do not grow as fast as books are printed. We would suggest that he bear it in mind in his next venture, and leave love-making aside. Also that he remember the faculty of imitation which is so well developed amongst juveniles and omit profanity altogether. "Andy Barr" is such a mixture of good and bad that the best use to be made of it is for the adults to keep it in their own hands and read selections to the little people. It would be as much of a pity to deprive them of the entertaining parts as it would be to put the rest before them. The Lothrop Company, which is making a laudable effort to furnish good, wholesome juvenile fiction, is the publisher of this volume, which appears to be the author's first venture in this field.

Stories of Jewish Life

"Idyls of the Gass" is a sympathetic study of the Jew as he appears at home, in his quarter of a European city. More specifically, it is the story of one little Jewish boy and his grandmother. Shimmele, as the little fellow is named, is a wonderfully bright little chap, but being the fifth born, his parents, poor and hard-working farmers, are not so keen to discover his talents. It remains for his grandmother, Maryam, to call attention to him as a prodigy when she discovers him reciting the long Hebrew graces at the age of three years. Immediately she sees in Shimmele the continuation of the long line of scholars from which she has descended, and schemes to attach the child to her, so that when she proposes to the father that Shimmele be given into her care the child is delighted to go. Maryam is no ordinary woman. In her girlhood she had studied with her brothers and the other students under her father's supervision, and now she is regarded by her neighbors and co-religionists as almost as wise and learned as the rabbi himself. She is the baker for her little community, and in her bake room much of the innocent gossip of the "gasse" is exchanged. Shimmele, in accordance with the designs of Maryam, who intends her precocious little grandson to be, in time, a high priest, is sent to attend all the religious services at the Schule, and we have a picture of the tiny child trotting off at half-past two in the morning to open the door for the worshipers, and reading the long prayers from the big prayer-book, too heavy for his little hands to hold, so that it is little wonder that he has his own opinion of prayers, and determines that in course of time he will be a baker or a carter rather than a rabbi. But Maryam proves her title to be regarded as a wise woman in her methods of dealing with this small handful of animated interrogation. When he boldly asks questions that one more ignorant or less sympathetic would answer by punishment, Maryam either answers wisely or leads his thoughts aside, and when he starts an independent investigation of mysteries and reports the result she leads him to confide in her and to keep his secrets between themselves. And if there is much learning of prayers and attending of services, there are also stories, and treats of sugar buns and dried plums to tempt the little scholar, and other lessons of justice and charity and forbearance taught without words. The last three stories tell of that strange fanaticism which breaks out every now and then in a persecution of the unfortunate Jews, who are subjected to the utmost cruelties on any flimsy accusation. A new boy, a Christian, drifts into the Jewish quarter and inaugurates a new game of stoning the children whom he accuses of being "Christ-killers." Our little man of course is specially selected for attention; later on a general persecution takes place and we leave little Shimmele reciting the Hebrew prayers for the dead over the bodies of his good, kind grandmother and his blind uncle, murdered by the mob. A sad recital, but a convincing one, and a timely book in view of the Kishinev disasters. Martha Wolfenstein is a comparatively new name in the literary world. Within its limitations "Idyls of the Gass" could scarcely be improved upon, and probably no other writer has shown as much insight into Jewish life, with the exceptions of Israel Zangwill and Emma Wolf. Just now the reading world shows a disposition to go mad over "Wee Macgreegor," but Wee Macgreegor is to Shimmele as skim milk is to strong meat. [Published by the Macmillan Company.]

A Good Juvenile

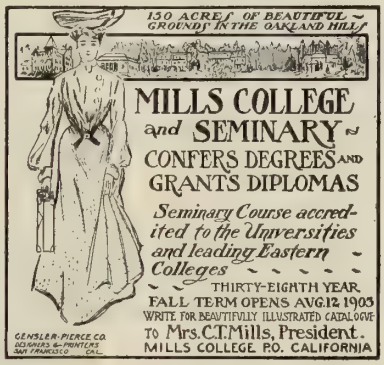
"Defending the Bank" is a lively juvenile story well told and not altogether improbable, as is apt to be the case with boys' books. Jack Talcott and Tom Reynolds are the heroes. Jack, the son of the banker, is an imaginative lad of about twelve years, and Tom is his chief crony. Jack is convalescing from an illness which has kept him in bed for a month, and when he is able to sit up his couch is placed near a window from which he can command a view of the principal street and the entrance of the bank. As he lies there he sees a strange man standing on the opposite corner, and with his little noddle filled with detective lore, pirates and such other delights of the penny dreadfuls he has read surreptitiously, he begins to weave a romance in which the stranger figures as a robber with designs on the treasure vaults. Soon another man joins the first for a brief conversation and he is allotted a role. After school hours Tom comes to call on his sick chum and is introduced to the plot. He is enlisted as a detective and sent to "shadow" the mysterious stranger, a task which he joyfully undertakes, in half-joke, whole-earnest fashion. His zeal outruns his discretion and he does many things which would not receive the sanction of his parents if they had been consulted, for Tom soon forgets that it is only a game he is engaged in and begins to suspect there is something more than appears on the surface. The two boys enlist fourteen year old Kate Talcott and for awhile they have plenty of fun, but it turns out, singularly enough, that they have stumbled on a real plot of bank robbery. Instead of reporting to their parents or to the authorities, the over-confident youngsters resolve to bag their own game and actually succeed in doing it. This is the kind of a story that healthy boys and birls have always reveled in. It is briskly told, with no long pages of moralizing or chapters of history and biography. The two lads are clean-minded, well behaved little fellows, and though they indulge plentifully in slang and vernacular, there is nothing vulgar about them. In fact, they are just such boys as we would choose for companions for our own youngsters, and parents who have an eye on the kind of books their children read need have no qualms of conscience if they find them deep in the pages of "Defending the Bank." Edward S. Van Zile is the author of the volume, which is one of a number of boys' books recently issued by D. Lothrop of Boston. —The Bookworm.

Locomotion By Elevation

I walked, when I first came to San Francisco, from my room in the Mission to the theatre, twice a day.

After a week's engagement I was enabled to take a car.

At the end of a month I was occasionally treated to a cab after the show.



It was a hired cab until after I met Johnny Clubman. He had my monogram placed on the doors.

I now ride to and from rehearsal and performance in my own automobile. I find Willie Millions very progressive. —The Ingenue.

Other People's Ideas

"It is wonderful how, under the pressure of a great calamity, we forget our quarrels and our spites, and are ready to jump at the prospect of the human companionship of our deadliest enemy. And 'the moral of that is,' as the White Queen says, that as we are all night and day fact to face with the last dread calamity—Death—we should throughout our lives behave as though we saw the the present shadow of his hand. But that will never happen in the world while human nature is human nature—and when will it become anything else?"
—"Mr. Meeson's Will," Rider Haggard.

From "The Intrusions of Peggy," by Anthony Hope:

Airey Newton: Life isn't taking in only, it's giving out, too. And it's not giving out only work or deeds or things we've made, it's giving ourselves out, too—freely,—freely, to other people. Giving ourselves in comradeship, in understanding, in joy, in love.

Newton: Men who buy love get the sort of love that's for sale.

Society is exceedingly charitable toward people who are definitely and finally out of the running. Those in the race run all; they become much more popular when it is understood that they do not compete for a prize.

Could anything be dull so long as one had brains to see the dullness.

A Mistake of the Wire

One of the most ludicrous mistakes ever made by the telegraph was caused by the loss of a single dot in a telegram from Brisbane to a London news agency. As it reached London it read thus: "Governor-General twins first son," which the news agency "edited" and sent around to the papers in the following form: "Lady Kennedy, the wife of Sir Arthur Kennedy, Governor-General of Queensland, yesterday gave birth at Government House, Brisbane, to twins, the first born being a son." The telegram arriving in the small hours of the morning, there was no time to refer to any books, and it was published in most of the newspapers of London and the provinces and caused an unexpected sensation. Sir Arthur's friends pointed out with conclusive force that someone had blundered, as there never was a Lady Kennedy, Sir Arthur being a bachelor. The repeated message which followed read: "Governor-General turns first sod," referring to a railway ceremony.

THE ARTISTIC ADVERTISING OF MARQUETTE WHISKEY

Xavier T. Martinez, one of the best known of San Francisco's artists, is placing upon the billboards of the city the most artistic line of Bulletin painting that has ever been shown in advertising pictorial art.

It is an almost unprecedented occurrence that an artist of such ability and reputation as Martinez should attend to the work of placing his artistic creations upon the boards. Rather than have the work that he has so carefully created copied by the hands of some sign painter, Martinez is doing the actual work of original conception upon the boards.

These bulletins are the story in pictures of the life of Marquette, the famous explorer. They take him through the long voyages of discovery down the Mississippi River and show him in the various scenes of adventure from the time that he started from the little Mission in Michigan to the day his bones were laid away beside the deep rushing waters of the Father of Rivers.

This is a rare treat for the lovers of the artistic in San Francisco. Martinez's work has been seen and appreciated in many of our galleries, but this is the first opportunity that has ever been given for the masses to view his work.

Grommes & Ullrich, the distillers of Marquette whiskey, in Chicago, have dedicated this series of beautiful paintings to the public of San Francisco in the hope that they will be appreciated as has been the finest, purest, and costliest made whiskey in the world, MARQUETTE.

The Local Post Office Scandal

Postmaster Montague is involved in a very bad scandal which the Federal authorities have had under investigation for some time, and there appears to be a disposition on all sides to treat him with great leniency. It has been shown that Mr. Montague and several of his subordinates are stockholders of a corporation engaged in selling a certain postal-box device to the Government. The business is a perfectly legitimate one, and the device is no doubt of considerable value, but it is something worse than a gross breach of the proprieties for the Postmaster and his subordinates to exercise their official influence for the promotion of their private enterprise at the expense of the department by which they are employed. Mr. Montague is said to have been greatly agitated by the scandal, and there has been talk of his resigning. His connection with the matter appears to be regarded in some quarters as a mere indiscretion due to an error of judgment. Mr. Montague is an old and respected merchant of this city, and he has always been ready to lend an air of respectability to a boss-ridden convention. He has rendered valuable services to the political powers and the Postmastership was his reward. Sentiment demands that he be treated leniently and no doubt he will, for he is a rich man with a great deal of influence, but the scandal is one that promises rich returns if properly exploited. The program is to make it appear that Montague has been pretty much in the hands of thrifty people in whom he reposed implicit confidence; that he was a mere figure-head used by the money-grabbers to dignify their illegitimate enterprise. Whatever may be the general opinion regarding Montague's connection with the postal device corporation, there is not the slightest doubt that as Postmaster he has been concerned principally with the drawing of his salary. The local post office has been managed in a very discreditable manner. A few months ago Town Talk had occasion to complain of the wretched postal service in this city, and immediately letters came from all parts of town approving the criticism that had been made, and reciting the experience of people who had suffered through Montague's mismanagement. There is urgent necessity for reforms in the local post office, and it is to be hoped that no time will be lost in instituting them.

A Suggestion to the Governor

Though Governor Pardee has been in office over eight months he has not yet instituted any of the reforms that were promised during the late gubernatorial campaign. Since his election he has probably discovered that the machinery of the State government is in fine working order and that there is no great need of repair. It is wonderful what a lot of room for reform is disclosed to the view of the candidate for office, and how quickly his vision is obscured after his election. But perhaps Governor Pardee has not yet thoroughly familiarized himself with all the multifarious affairs of State that have been entrusted to his management. For several months his time was occupied by the Legislature, and then Teddy Roosevelt came upon the scene, and the Governor was kept busy extending official courtesies. So arduous was this work that when it was over he retired with his family into the privacy of the redwoods in the Big Basin for rest and recreation, and it was only a week or so ago that he emerged from his sylvan retreat. So the Governor has not had much opportunity to go about reforming. However, it is to be hoped that in devoting a little time to the State Fair last week, he picked up some information about the abuses that thrive under the mismanagement of the political hacks who dominate the State Agricultural Society. There is an institution that has become moribund through mismanagement If the Governor thinks it worth his while to promote the agricultural interests of this State he should prosecute a searching inquiry into the affairs of that society.

Teddy's Latest Resolution

President Roosevelt is reported in the despatches to have adopted, in executive session with himself, another good resolution. It is to appoint better men to the United States consulships. He has resolved to name men who are already in the service, and who have had that experience and training in minor positions to render them more capable of filling places of higher grade and greater importance. This is an excellent resolution, fully as good as some of the best that Teddy has determined upon since entering the White House, but which, alas, he has not always found it expedient to keep. Good resolutions are sometimes like bad promises; it is advisable to break them. President Roosevelt has found it advisable to break several of his best resolutions, because to keep them would mean political disaster. It would greatly improve the consular service to maintain it on a sort of civil service basis. It would give reasonable assurance to the manufacturing and commercial interests intent upon the extension of the country's foreign trade, that in time all important consular positions will be filled by men of character and ability, but the President is bound to find it extremely embarrassing, if not impossible, to resist the importunities of Senators who desire to reward young men who were instrumental in securing the toga for them. The President cannot ignore the wishes of Senators who represent States that send large delegations to the National Convention. President Roosevelt means well, but he will find it hard to adhere to his commendable determination. It is unfortunate that Consular appointments are open for Senatorial spoliation, for as a consequence we send men unworthy and unfit, and a disgrace to the nation. That President Roosevelt will institute the much needed reform is quite beyond reasonable expectation.

The Past Is Buried

The fact that a wife failed to disclose her unchastity before marriage does not afford ground for the annulment of the marriage, is the decision of a referee acting under the direction of the Supreme Court of New York. The referee reported that some foreign law-writers of note have deemed marriage vitiated by error regarding the woman's ante-nuptial chastity, but that he had been unable to find that such a rule ever obtained in any common law jurisdiction. It is probably fortunate that the rule does not obtain in this country, for if it did the looseness of the marriage relationship would become a trifle more pronounced. What is sauce for the gander is sauce for the goose and dissatisfied wives would, under such a rule, have less difficulty than ever in breaking away from obnoxious husbands. It is bad enough for the courts to be called on to take cognizance of current events in the family circle. If they were empowered to pry into the past of both husbands and wives their researches might involve no end of unpleasant personal history. It has been wisely held in this country that a higher degree of fraud is requisite to void a marriage contract than suffices to vitiate any other. Marriage can only be void by such fraud as relates to the essence of the marriage relationship and to those qualities of the contracting parties necessary for the consummation of the fundamental purposes of marriage as an institution. The policy of the law is to refuse to grant divorce for any ante-nuptial misconduct. It regards marriage as a gateway to repentance and virtue. If a woman enters the married state reformed, and continues faithful to her marriage vows, every consideration of justice and humanity demands that the past should be considered forgiven and forgotten.

The Philosophy of Marriage

Dorothy Dix is of the opinion that happiness in marriage would be more often found if people sought their mates in their own class, but a local writer takes exception. He thinks it is not happiness but offspring which is the object of marriage. If people always married in their own class the bright minds would mate together, and the frivolous fools would seek each other out, so that we should have distinct classification of all sages on one side and all idiots on the other, while under the present system, the children begotten of the union of the soubrette and the Puritan combine the qualities of both parents and we have a blend which, presumably, is better than one though worse than the other. This philosopher imagines that the offspring of any marriage partakes of the qualities of both parents in practically equal proportions. Unfortunately this is not the case. There is no calculating results. Not only is there not an exact proportionment of the qualities of the immediate progenitors, but there is more or less of the grandparents and great grandparents, and collaterals. The brilliant scientist or jurist who marries a frivolous wife to please his fancy will not be any the less inclined to blame her when his son, destined to succeed him, displays the maternal characteristics instead of the paternal, and similarly, he will not love his daughter the more because instead of being pliant to his will she opposes it with all the strength that she has inherited from him. The good miller of Dorlcote is not the only character in fiction or in life who, having deliberately selected a wife for her amiable stupidity, in the expectation that his sons would take after him, and his daughters, in turn, please other men with his own views, finds that in this puzzling world his plans have got twisted and that it is the sons who take after the mother while the girls are endowed with brains for which he can see no use. When Mademoiselle Millions elopes with the coachman, the presumption according to the local sociologist's way of reasoning, is that the children born to them will be midway between the extremes. They will inherit the social graces of mamma and the democratic simplicity of the coachman. But Mademoiselle was not thinking so much of the veritable driver of papa's horses as she was of some idealization of her own. It is not John or Patrick that she marries, but a fairy prince in disguise, and she half-unconsciously expects a grand transformation such as winds up the Christmas pantomime, and when it does not take place she is not backward about voicing her disappointment. Similarly, when her brother levants with the cook, he is not satisfied to find that she will remain the cook to the end of the chapter, and the children, along with their misfortune of not pleasing the parents either way, because of things which they cannot help, grow up in an atmosphere of bickering and recrimination. The ex-heiress will not be slow at reminding her coachman of all she gave up for him, nor will he often restrain his tongue from reminding her that she was remarkably anxious to secure him. The Simple Simon son of the man of parts will not go unrebuked because he takes after his mother, nor will the over-brilliant daughter fail of reminders that she is "all Jones." Apart from this, there is the matter of social etiquette and small observances. They are second nature to one member of the family and an untranslated book to the other, and as Herbert Wace tersely puts it in "The Kempton-Wace Letters," "Many a home has been broken because of a disagreement as to the uses and abuses of couch cushions, and more than one divorce induced by the lingering of tobacco odors in the curtains." If, when people from widely separated classes marry, they would be content with their selections, and not demand that the cook should likewise be a countess and the coachman a cavalier, all would go well, perhaps, but there are a thousand inevitable pin-pricks inflicted every day by one who is utterly unable to comprehend why they should cause annoyance, and so far from the children of these mesalliances enjoying special privileges, they are crushed between the upper and the nether millstone. If marriages are entered into with an eye single to the welfare of children,the fewer causes there are for friction the better for them.

Our Ridiculous Education System

When President Roosevelt sent his son Archie to a public school great was the self-laudation of the public educator. Here was proof most positive that the system

The "note of distinction," you know what that means in a man's dress, that indefinable something that places a man apart from the ordinary crowd, an expression of style and personality. All these virtues make our fall models have the "note of distinction."

was the acme of perfection and that the humblest tenement dweller had at his pleasure as much as the highest in the land. Now it is discovered that Master Archie has learned as much and as little as any other youngster of his years, and is henceforth to be put under private instruction, and the same class of writers who glorified the public school before because of its perfections are now finding reasons why less should be expected of the "system" than of private institutions. Chiefly, of course, it is because the private schools have more money to spend. But the failure of the public schools is not one to be remedied by more money. Rather would they benefit by a reduction of expenses and strict attention to their legitimate business. The complaint which President Roosevelt has voiced with regard to young Archie is identical with the objection raised by Tim O'Brien with his Patsy. It has been echoed from every quarter of the United States for the last ten years, and the only response thus far vouchsafed has been to add one more fad to the curriculum. President Roosevelt finds that his boy can give an accurate scientific description and classification of the grasshopper, but he cannot spell simple words, write legibly, or perform simple operations in arithmetic correctly. No doubt the boy can make mud pies and draw caricatures in colored crayon, too, and perform a variety of other esthetic stunts which are in the nature of blowing soap-bubbles as compared with the essential groundwork of education. The trouble with the public schools is not in shortage of funds but in spending so much foolishly. There is no fad too fatuous to be foisted upon the school department, and teachers dread the advent of every visitor lest he prove to be some hobby-rider with a pull. Let a bugologist drop into a kindergarten and discover that the lisping infants are not conversant with lepidoptera and coleoptera, though Heaven knows it is little that is spared them, and immediately he must write to the papers about it. After him comes a charming lady with a passion for birds, and her kettle boils over because the youngsters are not expert ornithologists. If she is sufficiently plausible and insinuating, bird lore is wedged into the course of study. Along comes some embryo botanist, and straightway they are set to pulling blossoms apart and making copies of scientific terms, learning to "tell the wild flowers." Next comes a professional musician, and all his fat is in the fire because the children cannot read music at sight, and close in his wake follow seamstress, cook and some manual handicraftsman, each of whom lays a straw on the pack. All this while the poor babies are struggling with what one of them described as "that silly little Indian named High Water," and they are memorizing poems, and examining Pussy's claws under the supervision of teacher, and playing "Simon says thumbs up" to develop their powers of observation, and growing more muddled every day. Ella Wheeler Wilcox is howling because the children do not breathe her way, and some one else is lamenting the evils of vertical penmanship, and a new crank, imagining all the world is as stupid as himself, is gnashing his teeth because geography is taught from wall maps instead of from relief maps constructed on the class-room floor and laid true to the points of the compass. Meantime, the children are like a flock of sheep harried hither and yonder, up hill and down dale; there is just as much of a chance for them to get an education as there is for the sheep to get fat. But the "system" flourishes apace.

Peary and the Pole

The Navy Department has granted Lieutenant Peary a three years' leave, and he is to renew his attempt to reach the North Pole, backed by the Peary Arctic Club, with ample funds. Peary has conducted his explorations heretofore at a disadvantage owing to an insufficiency of funds to provide an adequate supporting party and a satisfactory base, but he will be fully equipped for the next trip which he is to make in the spring. Arctic explorers are now more sanguine than ever of the accessibility of the pole, and though Peary did not reach the highest point north, he has done more than all others toward solving the problem that confronts the adventurous spirits who are intent upon reaching the prize. Captain Cagni, of the Italian expedition, reached the highest point ever attained within a month after leaving his ship or base of supplies, and Nansen with the second highest record, reached his northermost point within twenty-four hours after leaving his ship. Owing to lack of means Peary was compelled to establish his base of supplies three hundred and fifty miles to the south of the point at which he should have begun his journey, and when he reached the great unknown region of ice the season was too far advanced. However he kept on to within sixty-five miles of the highest point ever attained. He now purposes establishing his camp on the shore of the frozen ocean, or the northern coast of Grant Land, and making the trip over the ice between sunrise and the late summer, when the conditions are favorable for sledging. The round trip from that point is not as great as the distance Peary has covered on several of his sledge expeditions, and therefore his backers have great confidence in his ability to win the glory that awaits the pole finder. Mrs. Peary will not accompany her husband to the polar regions as she did before, much to the discomfort of the men in the party. But she is not deterred by reason of any awakening of a sense of delicacy. A new baby arrived in the Peary home some days ago, and that is why she has decided to stay home. One of the Peary children was born in the Arctic.

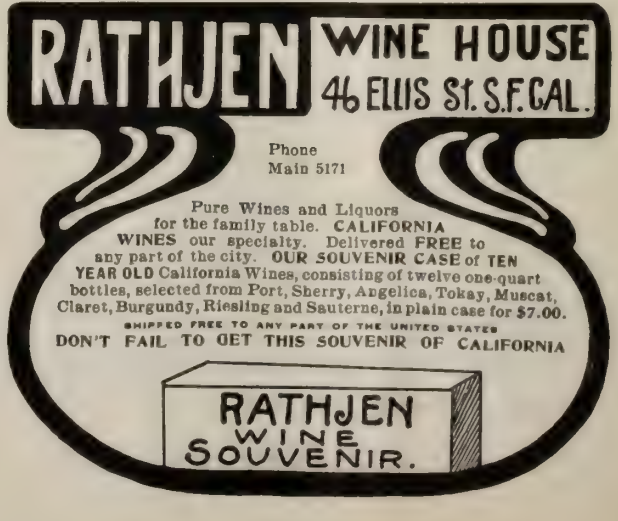
The Gospel of Gladness

BY HARRY COWELL

One course at least in the sweet uses of adversity seems indispensable to complete culture. Nothing can disguise the boorishness of those who have never had Sorrow for master. They are inevitably crude—gold it may be, but unfinished, lacking the work of the file. "Pain," as poor Heine has it, does indeed "spiritualize the limbs." In little need, however, of having this truth emphasized is a world that for nineteen hundred gray years has been worshiping the cross. Rather it needs to hear reiterated that by laughter is life more severely tested than by tears; that it is easier to bear grief nobly than nobly to bear joy; that by means of happiness the hero is known; that one must learn the sweeter uses of prosperity before one is fit for heaven. Surely it is success, not failure, that tries the soul. Are not men proved more by riches and power than by poverty and dependence? Many a peasant can weep with dignity, but he is more than a lord who can be merry and not vulgar. The nouveau riche should never jest. The lesser gods do well to be serious and distant; not one of them can afford to be jovial save Jupiter Olympus himself. Countless lovers have been "lost by a laugh." The friendship that survives the "funny mood" of its object bids fair to be eternal. The angels weep over the laughter of men. Where is now the poet great enough to sing in adequate numbers the gladness of the world? Who dares to be joyous in prose? Mirth remains to be said and sung.

Let no one, therefore, think that the new gospel of gladness, with its pleasant apostles, and their sayings of sunshine, requires little of men. On the contrary, it asks great things: the childish heart, the perfect love that casts out fear, the elimination of cruelty and vulgarity, neither of which is compatible with laughter. It is vice that grins and makes all manner of grimaces; virtue alone knows how to smile.



I am not of those who deny the existence of evil and rejoice early and late because all's well with the world. In the world as I see it much is to mend. If everything were indeed good, there would be no need of affirming the fact by day and by night. I resent being treated as doctors treat sick folk, and told only news nice to hear. It is not optimism at all but the lowest form of pessimism and the most reprehensible, that is constrained to lie about the state of things, to whistle down churchyard fears; that is forever inferring that if one were to look facts in the face life would not be worth the living. No, the laughter that is born of the dogma that whatever is, is right is of sadder sound than the wailings of broken-hearted women; the whistle of the dogmatists about as cheerful as a storm wind in the fire-forgotten chimney of a deserted hut wherein a lone traveler seeks shelter at dead of night.

There is, however, a soul of truth in things erroneous which is seldom far to seek. Evil does in sad truth exist; but one would just as well not make much of it, not give it house room or countenance. It is a mistake to deny the presence of evil, it is a crime to be forever affirming it.

But there are high priests of "Happiness-here-and-now," who preach a gospel of gladness worth any man's ear. Their very voices caress you like spring sunshine; in their smiling presence pessimism is impossible. With impeccable instinct they take hold of everything by the happier handle. If Evil does at times force his uninvited company upon them, he is at once induced as if by magic to be upon his best behavior—a behavior inconceivably good. Delight attends their downsittings and remains with you long after their uprisings. With the air of an interloper, Pain retreats before them. They sow smiles broadcast and from even the stoniest places reap incredible harvests. While they keep you company, ten thousand reasons for being happy undreamed of before they came occur to your mind, and that without the least prompting on their part. Or else you find yourself unreasonably happy. Man, you begin to surmise, was made for joy, and sadness now seems to you little short of blasphemy.

All this that they do for you is done without effort, without a counting of cost. They give forth their gladness as flowers do their perfume, because in the nature of things they must. Thus they fulfill their destiny. You never dream of thanking them. You may even enjoy the benefits of their friendship for years before awakening to the fact that goodness of a very exquisite sort is theirs. Let an ordinary person do a noble action, and forthwith you hasten to give him full credit for it; but with them nobility is to common to be noticed; the very finest conduct is taken as a matter of course. Over the least lapse of theirs you would make more ado than over the crimes of others. 'Tis a high compliment you pay them, though unintended. Where they are, a sullen look seems out of place, and no matter what has gone wrong, you perforce must match them smile for smile. They are philanthropists without pose, and the beneficiary takes their gifts without loss of self-respect; high priests they are who cause in the layman no uncomfortable feeling of spiritual inferiority. You hardly believed yourself capable of such sublime emotions as you happened to experience during one or other of their occasional visits. To connect their presence with your unusual exaltation of spirit would be to make a quite uncalled for use of coincidence. The uplift that they leave behind them in the hearts of men is as the flower of mythology that sprang up in the footsteps of earth-going immortals. Whenever one of them comes my way, like music, through my mind runs these lines of Shelley's:

"Lamp of Earth, where'er thou movest,
Its dim shapes are clad with brightness,
And the souls of whom thou lovest
Walk upon the winds with lightness."

A Yesterday

There's a land I know,
  Its beauties lie
  'Neath a tropical sky.
There the cacti grow;
There the red-lipped, sun-kissed cacti grow,
  And glow, and glow.

There's a face I know;
  Two red lips set
  Round a cigarette;
There's a promise low,
There are raven lashes drooping low
  O'er eyes that glow.

There's a spot I know;
  A face lies white
  In the moon's cold light,
And the cacti grow—
And the red-lipped cacti, blood-red grow,
  And glint and glow.

MABEL PORTER PITTS.

The Saunterer

Another Pretty Mess

The hoodoo which has long haunted the Hotel Rafael is still doing business at the old stand. He has been somewhat apathetic this season but just at its close his invidious spell is felt once more. Another scandal has broken out in the baron's summer hostelry. Everything was running along smoothly, and the management was becoming very well satisfied with itself when, like the proverbial thunderbolt out of a serene sky, the guests were thrown into a panic through the sensational disclosures of one of the waitresses in the dining-room. The scandal was precipitated by her refusal to serve two of the male guests who occupied a table within the limits of her domain. The men are of some prominence in this city; one is an architect and the other is a broker. The latter is an enthusiastic golf player. The waitress went on a strike, she explained, because their conversation at the table was such as to mantle her cheeks with blushes.

Tar and Feathers Suggested

She related that they carried on their conversation in a way that convinced her that it was intended for her ears, and that it usually related to feminine guests of the hotel. Of course it was not long before the other guests learned of the complaint made by the waitress, and since then the matter has been the subject of much tittle-tattle. Moreover some of the men were very indignant, and there was actually some talk of tar and feathers. The accused men were interviewed by the manager of the hotel, and they stigmatized the story of the waitress as a malicious falsehood, but later on it was reported that some months ago another waitress who had served the two men went on a strike, too, because she objected to their highly spiced dialogue. However the management took no action, being in doubt as to how the question of veracity should be resolved. So there the matter rests. It is an unfortunate predicament for the men to be in if they are innocent, because of course they are viewed askance by many of their fellow boarders. It happens that one of them is an inveterate story-teller, and therefore a terrible bore to people who go to San Rafael for peace and quiet. Those who have suffered from him are naturally inclined to believe the charges. However it is a very nasty mess, and the baron is blamed for not having had sense enough to employ men in his dining-room instead of modest maidens who shy at salacity.

Hayward Leaves His Old Home

The story comes to me from San Mateo that the old home of Alvinza Hayward has been vacated by the aged millionaire, and on its heels comes the rumor that his departure was due to fresh differences with his wife from whom he has been separated for several years. It appears that some years ago, when Hayward was seriously ill, he conveyed the bulk of his fortune to his wife, and that when he recovered, differences arose between them owing to the interest which he was taking in spiritualism and spiritualists. Mrs. Hayward refused to deed back the property, fearing, it was said, that the spiritualists would get it. A few years later, however, when Hayward was in financial straits his wife came to his rescue, and since that time he is supposed to have made a great deal of money.

As To His Wealth

Hayward is now popularly believed to be a very rich man, but there are some who say that his operations of late have been conducted largely on borrowed capital, and that though he has a good income he is not as wealthy as he is reputed to be. Since the closing down of the Utica mine, from which he derived the greater portion of his fortune, his income has been largely reduced, but the old man has lost none of his cunning as a financier though he is eighty years of age. He lately showed that he still possessed great vitality when he pulled through a severe attack of pneumonia. It was remarked that during that severe illness his wife, and his daughter, who is married to a New York broker named Roe, failed to come to his bedside. Now the story goes that since his recovery his daughter came to this city to get some money from him and was refused, and that thereupon orders came from Mrs. Hayward in New York for the closing of the old home at San Mateo, which stands in her name. This is the gossip to be heard at the suburban resort.

They Had Money to Burn

In ye olden tyme, when the waters of the bay laved the sands of this growing metropolis at Montgomery street, and the red-shirted miners came down from Jack Ass Gulch to paint the village red, it was not unusual for them to sprinkle the stage of the old Bella Union with the coin of the realm to signify their appreciation of a pioneer show-girl. History tells us that Lotta picked up many a coin that clinked on the stage in those days. But Lotta was young then. In later years she would probably have resented the offering as an insult. Something of the spirit that imbued those horny-fisted miners was transmitted, it appears, from sire to son, for two of the sons of pioneers gave a spectacular exhibition of their prodigality the other night at Fischer's, that was reminiscent of the days of '49. But whereas the miners of old were inspired by the grace, beauty and talent of the sex which was very sparsely represented in those days, the sons of pioneers had their enthusiasm aroused by the masculine biped. Kolb, Dill and Bernard were on the stage playing on the risibles of their audience, when Walter Magee and Joe Eastland began emptying their pockets over the footlights. The comedians were at first astonished, but they soon understood the situation and entered int othe spirit of it good-naturedly. Bernard picked up one of the coins and invited his German friends into a saloon set on the stage, saying, "Let us have a drink with some of Walter Magee's foolishness." A little later Maud Amber appeared, and some coin was thrown at her, but she was content with her salary.

An Indignant Correspondent

The activity of the Daughters of the Confederacy these days has aroused the indignation of a correspondent, who gravely asks me the question if I think it well "for the rising generation to see and to know that a traitor to his country has as much respect and honor bestowed upon his memory as has a loyal man?" This is surely waving the bloody shirt with a vengeance. I have been of the opinion that all the animosities of the late unpleasantness had been buried, and that we of the North had actually grown to admire the misguided grit of the heroes of the Lost Cause; that we had become convinced that they were imbued with something of the same spirit that inspired our Revolutionary sires, and that they were completely vindicated a short time ago, when the sons of the Gray joined hands with the sons of the Blue and marched against the common foe. But it appears that I have been laboring under a delusion, for my correspondent is one dissenter who fairly writhes in indignation in contemplating the activity of the Confederate Daughters. I am asked why they were not in evidence during the G. A. R. festivities; why they did not entertain the association of army nurses, composed of women whose ministrations were bestowed on the Gray as well as on the Blue. All of which I am unable to answer.

The Ardent Dr. Scott

Furthermore, I am asked upon what does Mrs. Kittle, who recently entertained the Daughters, base her claim of lineal descent from a representative of the Confederacy. I have never heard that Mrs. Kittle claimed to be the descendant of a representative of the Confederacy, but I do not believe it necessary to prove such descent in order to enter one of the chapters of the society. Mrs. Kittle is the daughter of the Rev. W. M. A. Scott who, though he was not in the Confederate army, proved conclusively that his sympathies were with the South. He preached and prayed for rebellion in the old Calvary church during the war, for which loyal service to the Confederacy he was burned in effigy, and shortly after departed from the city. He returned when his son-in-law, Harry Newhall, built St. John's Presbyterian church for the venerable gentleman. But while Mrs. Kittle's father was preaching rebellion her brother, Robert, was an officer of the Federal army, and he was afterward engaged in writing the official history of the war. Moreover Mrs. Kittle's husband, Nick Kittle, was a loyal Northerner, so after all she can take to either side of the fence that is most congenial.

The Voorhies Boom

And, by the way, I am reminded that the question of veracity which arose some time ago when Mrs. Salisbury undertook to explain the why, the wherefore and the how of the rivalry between the local D. C.'s, has not yet been adjudicated. Indeed it appears to have been regarded as a matter of no importance, and yet when it was first sprung there was great indignation among the ladies. Since then Mrs. Salisbury has treated the rival chapters with great consideration, and has given them no end of social booming. And in a recent issue of the Bulletin she launched a political boom for Mrs. Voorhies in these words: "I hear there is some talk of making Mrs. Voorhies president of the Albert Sidney Johnston chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, which strikes me will be a very wise thing to do, as from the very first organization on this coast she has been a most active member," etc.

Merely a Rumor

Somebody started the rumor early this week that Jimmy Phelan had bought the Call from John D. Spreckels, and it spread with great rapidity. Moreover it was given credence by many people who pride themselves on being hard to gull. Some said they believed it because they knew Mr. Spreckels had become tired of the newspaper business and wanted to sell, and others said that they didn't doubt it because they knew Mr. Phelan wanted a paper with which to boom himself into the United States Senate. They also recalled that the ambitious young millionaire was negotiating for the Post just before the railroad sold that paper. Intimate friends of Mr. Spreckels say that he has no intention of selling the Call; that he thinks running a newspaper is as much fun as sailing a yacht. He gets as much amusement out of one as the other. When Mr. Phelan was asked if he was thinking of buying a paper he said that he had troubles enough. It was suggested that like Mr. Spreckels he might want one for a toy, and he said that he never cared to play with explosives. He was then told that it was rumored that he wanted a paper with which to boom himself politically. "Not after observing the boomerang effects on men in high towers," he said.

The Cocos Island Treasure

The story of hidden treasure in Cocos Island which was believed by several capitalists who backed a futile expedition to the South Seas whence they recently returned filled with indignation, is very old. As early as 1855, the schooner Julius Pringle left this port for Cocos Island with a party of treasure-hunters lured by that same yarn about treasure that had been stolen from churches in Peru, and buried in that far-away land. After several months they returned in disgust. Some Stockton people backed a similar enterprise several years ago. A Captain Gessler was the promoter. He secured a concession from the Costa Rican government and spent about two years in making excavations on the island in search for hidden gold. He merely wasted his time.

Drown-Boardman Engagement

Nobody was surprised that Miss Hibernia Drown should make the biggest matrimonial catch of the season. Bernie is a great favorite, and she has had many suitors since her "coming out" several seasons back. At one time a rumor went the rounds that she was in love with a poor army officer, and that her parents would not approve of a match between them. But as she went about with her usual cheery, smiling countenance it was not really believed that the worm was pining in the bud. Sam Boardman has been angled for by managing mammas for many years. He has been reported engaged at least a dozen times. For an entire season San Rafael gossips had him the fiance of Edith McBean, who is now Mrs. Kierstedt. The match is in every way an admirable one. Mr. Boardman has lots of money, and Miss Drown has fairly good looks and a charming disposition. The sycophantic gushers of the dailies report her to be a beauty but she is not. But she is a sensible, good-natured girl with many fine qualities of heart and mind.

Now for Tom Driscoll

There will be few eligible bachelors left for flirtation with the buds who are to come out this winter. It has been suggested that Seniors from the university will have to be imported from Berkeley to help out the lists of dancing men. But there is still one bachelor at large, though rumor says that big-hearted, generous Tom Driscoll has developed matrimonial intentions during the last few months. I was the first to point the direction in which his fancy lay. The young woman whose name Mr. Driscoll's has been coupled with is Miss Eleanor McEwen. She is quite a stunning looking girl, a demi-blonde and has taught school since she graduated from the local Normal some years ago. Driscoll's Burlingame friends rather discredit the rumor of his engagement.

To Match Her With a Nobleman

Miss Azalea Keyes has been visiting her step-grandmother in the south of France, and it is said that the latter contemplates arranging a match for her with a nobleman. Miss Keyes has a fortune of a quarter of a million, and she has expectations of a large inheritance. Mrs. Keyes is the mother of Alexander Keyes who married Miss Salisbury. Her sister married Dr. Edward Keyes of New York. She has never visited California since becoming a widow. She had a daughter who married a French officer of high rank. Some years ago Alexander Keyes was placed in a French monastic school but as soon as he had his own say he returned to California, and he has not been away since. His fortune will some day be greatly augmented for Mrs. Keyes of France is very rich.

The Scapegoat Dodge

At this stage of the proceedings relating to the post office scandal, it looks very much as though certain conspirators are intent upon making a scapegoat of Mr. James W. Erwin, the least culpable of all the local officials involved. Erwin is one of the most efficient men ever connected with the postal department, and he is a man who has filled many positions of trust, and handled large sums of government money. He was sent to Cuba and to the Philippines to establish the postal system of this country, and his work has always been highly commended. He is a man generally admired for his scrupulous character, and for his zeal and ability. It is significant of the esteem in which he is held that when the news of his indictment was published it was generally discredited. Mr. Erwin was for several years president of the Camera Club, and as soon as the members of that organization learned that he had been indicted, a meeting was held and resolutions expressing confidence in his integrity were adopted.
